"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

When this play first appeared in London, in 1919, it was regarded as the principal event of the year. Under the auspices of Nigel Playfair and Arnold Bennett, it had been first presented at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre, and it was considered venturesome in the extreme to try it on the Londoners.

But it was done, and events justified the full confidence of the producers. Royalty went, nobles and commoners, until the living stream of enthusiasm rose to hundreds of thousands of people.

It is a strange incident in the history of the Anglo-Saxon stage; for who would have thought that it would be an Englishman that would first place Lincoln in the most sympathetic light as the leading figure in the greatest, most moving drama of our national life? Perhaps the last line in the play, "Now he belongs to the ages," is the best explanation.

But the world war freshened in men's hearts the memory of the great, noble, self-forgetting personality that has been one of the most precious gifts of the American people. Great leaders were needed, in that troubled epoch, and there was the memory of one of the greatest to inspire high thoughts and move men's hearts.

Besides, an Englishman, Lord Charnock, had already written an able and deeply sympathetic monograph on Lincoln's life and character; the play, indeed, being dedicated to Lord Charnock.

Mr. Drinkwater, however, deprecates the idea of his purpose being to add anything of a historical nature to the numerous biographies on Lincoln, his aim being to indicate "the profoundly dramatic interest of his character, and the inspiring example of a man who handled war nobly and with imagination."

Thus the play appears as a great drama of character. Its political aspect is predominant in the first part, but as the action proceeds the moral grandeur of Lincoln's character is unfolded, and also the potent influence he exerted on those about him who had ears to hear, minds to understand, and hearts to feel.

Americans of limited imagination and sympathy who saw the play in London overlooked its excellence because the English author used words and expressions only heard in America from the lips of Anglomaniacs. However, when the play was brought to New York the majority of these expressions were suitably altered or entirely eliminated. General Grant no longer exclaimed "My word!" although Mrs. Goliath Blow speaks, Englishwise, of "the dear President," and the independent Susan says "Thank you, sir," like a well-trained English servant, for being kindly permitted to render services to her profoundly respected superiors; an emotion unknown to the American-born menial.

But it is bootless to search for small faults in a work that comes near to being a masterpiece; not in construction, which is faulty; not in dialogue, which is at times oratorical; not in plot, which is absent, the play being presented as a series of episodes which gradually lead to the tremendous and intensely moving climax, but in true historical atmosphere and in spirit.

For Mr. Drinkwater's great virtue has been to present the Lincoln who is still remembered by living men, and whose simple, unswerving integrity, whose mingling of heart and head wisdom, whose shrewd penetration, and whose infinite comprehension of and large-hearted sympathy for plain, common humanity have passed into a proverb. These qualities endear him to the popular heart. He was kind, generous, and forgiving, but the shrewd Americans especially love his memory because with all his goodness the unscrupulous could never "do" him.

His humor Mr. Drinkwater has not grasped—perhaps because it is so essentially national—and the scene of the reading from Artemus Ward, as also the chatter of Mrs. Goliath Blow at Mrs. Lincoln's tea party, lacked the savor of real fun.

The play is episodic; that is one of its faults; and its complexion, in the earlier scenes, has a political tinge, because the movements of politics brought Lincoln forward into the light that attracted all men's eyes.

But as the years advance, and the national tragedy that cast so many shadows into the recesses of Lincoln's great, kindly heart is developed in this drama of a noble soul, we begin to see more clearly the influence of character upon character.

Two scenes of surpassing beauty are shown: one that in which Grant, another Greatheart, received the surrender of his knightly foe with that rare generosity which thrills even petty souls, one can but believe. Another is that in which Lincoln, ever tender, forgiving, and compassionate to the faults of youth, set the first arch of beautiful color in that rainbow of promise which assures the young soldier that his more venal faults shall not be punished by the disgraceful death that only the base and ignoble merit.

No better way could be devised to make us realize the grim unwisdom of that old method of punishing the boy soldier's normal faults so terribly than to show us a promising lad of pathetically tender years doomed to a shameful death not really deserved.

The last scene leads to the culminating tragedy. So mortal seemed the weariness overshadowing the doomed chief that when the blow fell, and we heard the mourning wail of his widow, there was, mingled with the deep emotion inspired by the event, a strange realization that sometimes life among average humanity is too trying for lonely greatness, and that death means grateful rest.

Frank McGlynn is remarkably endowed, in face and build, to represent Lincoln. He is not actually a great actor, on account of some inability to strike the most thrilling note in the gamut of emotion. But he is an exceedingly fine one, and as we saw the unfolding of the interpretation, and noted how fine, how consistent it was, how thoroughly he remained in character throughout, and noted, too, the wealth of illuminative detail in the personation, we realized that we were witnessing an unusual display of histrionism, and one in which the native character of the actor played an important part. For when Mr. McGlynn, at the end of the play, came out in his own person to greet an audience in his home town in which he saw the faces of many friends, it was easy to believe that the owner of Frank McGlynn's face was also the pos-essor of a heart and mind worthy of such a rôle.

Our respect grew steadily for Mr. McGlynn as each scene was presented. He was Lincoln to us from the beginning, his only deficiency a lack of vocal power suitable to a man of his size, and quite wonderfully Lincoln's physical counterpart, so remarkable was the make-up with which he augmented his natural fitness for a representation of the physical man. But above all he drew us in constant sympathy with the suffering soul of the leader of a great people engaged in suicidal conflict.

The company is a very good one, although here and there one saw slight blurs on excellence that showed different degrees of merit. It is, naturally, a man's play, and there are excellent results obtained in following the dress and hair fashions of the times. Quite a number of the faces are noticeably English, but the company has prudently eliminated the more marked English provincialism from its speech, the Englishness being more particularly noticeable in distinctness, refinement of intonation, and the agreeable English voice.

Generally speaking, the collective work was excellent, the only actor meriting special criticism being the one who was "the chronicler," and who failed to bring out the full meaning of the poet's foreword in blank verse preceding each rise of the curtain. To read these forewords, however, is to discover that their thoughtful beauty is so expressed as to be rather difficult to convey.

The cast is very long, and the English players strangers to us, therefore it would be too tedious a matter to specify by name the principals in the cast. I noticed, however, how hushed the house became when Mrs. Otterly spoke to Lincoln of her bereavement, the actress in the part having that ability to make every syllable sink into a hushed, responsive receptivity. And in the night, thinking it over, suddenly memory came. Jennie Eustace! She was here years ago in an excellent New York company, and we have seen her since. She always does good work. I saw her once called upon to substitute for some young beauty whom she was understudying in "Lady Windermere's Fan." She was not suitable, physically, for the rôle of Lady Windermere at all, but she came through triumphantly by sheer merit. Another very English face is that of William Corbett, playing the fictitious character of Burnet Hook, who was meant to be typical of the hostile forces in the Cabinet, striving to undermine Lincoln's work. Mr. Corbett's deliberate art is very telling, and the portraiture most effective.

The scene at General Grant's headquarters is admirable in its eschewing of all theatricalism except that the melodrama of life, real life, was there. William W. Crimans gave a fine, soldierly picture of the great general, and the two other generals were ably presented.

English though she looked, I liked Winifred Hanley's quiet, sincere presentation of the character of Mrs. Lincoln, for she grasped its essential plainness, bluntness, and sincerity.

There was a capacity house on the opening night, and the play may run three weeks. Lucky for us that we can idealize our great men to such effect that they are, as foreign critics have sometimes complained, too sacred to us. But Lincoln is peculiarly dear to us in his simple, kindly, wise humanity; more so than Washington, who, in his niche so much farther back on fame's highway, has around his brow the aureole lent by historical perspective.

Lincoln is nearer, and dearer, and when at his death in the play we heard the lamentation of a bereaved people, hard was the heart that would not swell, steel the eye that refused a tear, and hostile the emotions that could not grieve again for the death of a great national chief.

Already there are signs that every one and his young are going to see the play, that they may revivify the memory of a man so great that our words of praise have never yet become perfunctory or hackneyed. Which reminds me. Why doesn't some one select, for the orchestra, music appropriate to the play? People love the old songs when the occasion makes them appropriate, and many were the battle songs of the rebellion that still can rouse shivers of sympathetic emotion. An example is furnished in the play itself, when we hear the marching of young feet in the dark outdoors, while young voices sing "Tenting Tonight." There were many, many tears surreptitiously wiped away when those still familiar strains arose.

LILLIAN RUSSELL.

The profession has burst out into a shower of regretful, even mournful eulogies, since Lillian Russell's death, for, in spite of beauty, charm, and success in the most jealousy-kindling of all professions, this popular and admired actress was much loved by her associates.

Lillian Russell began her career as a stage beauty, her personal appearance being so striking that her associates called her "the Queen." She showed talent at once, but in those days she was particularly prized for the double assets of a chorus girl: a lovely face and a symmetrical figure.

It was a little later, when an increase in weight began to thicken her contours that she was seen in San Francisco. By that time she was playing the principal female rôle in a musical comedy about the Nile; title forgotten.

Then, after her popularity in the Weber & Field vaudeville—in which, by the way, the public discovered that not only could the beauty sing, but do burlesque—she took up light comedy work, and made a success in that.

As the years went on the public discovered that the versatile actress was a good light

Calaveras and Co-Operation

"The foresight of the company throughout its history has been rather remarkable. For example, as early as 1860, when San Francisco had only 60,000 people, rights were acquired on the peninsula at Pilarcitos; and in 1875 lands were bought at Calaveras Valley, in Alameda County. The system has expanded, unit by unit, as the need arose."—The Master in Chancery, S. V. W. Co. Rate Case.

At the present time water from the Calaveras Reservoir is released into Alameda Creek and flows through the underground gravels to the collecting galleries that empty into the Sunol Water Temple. Thence this water is conveyed, together with Sunol and Pleasanton water, across the Bay to San Francisco.

In the near future Calaveras water will flow part of the way to San Francisco through the westerly section of the Hetch Hetchy aqueduct.

San Francisco is about to commence construction of this Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy line, extending from Irvington in Alameda County to Crystal Springs Reservoir in San Mateo County.

Concurrently, Spring Valley is raising Calaveras Dam high enough to impound 32 billion gallons of water (it will some day be raised higher still), and will build an aqueduct to take this water as far as Irvington.

Spring Valley will pay to the city the cost of "routing" Calaveras water through the Hetch Hetchy line.

The city work and the company work will be completed together and 24 million gallons daily will be added to our water supply, making it 66 million gallons daily.

This coöperation between the city and Spring Valley in an engineering programme to increase the water supply is something entirely new in the relations between a city and a privately-owned water company.

A proper understanding on the part of those charged with responsibility—the Railroad Commission, the city and this company—inspired this coöperation.

comedian, and she was popular in these parts until she began to find a difficulty in getting good plays, and finally retired from professional work.

The public was always aware that she had great charm of manner, but it did not know that that charm proceeded from a nature compounded of a group of well-balanced and desirable qualities: kind-heartedness, common sense, shrewdness, absence of egotism, natural cheerfulness, an ability to put self aside in her habitual consideration for others, and an absence of temper.

All this Tony Pastor has made plain in an interesting account of Lillian Russell as she was during her Weber & Field days.

Tony Pastor says that he does not know whether or not she used methods to preserve her beauty, but I always firmly believed that she enjoyed in her own self a happy combination of the physical and mental that made her beauty last. She herself has said that a calm mind is the surest beauty preservative. She had the supreme gift, and being devoid of vanity she did not worry about preserving it.

Here were her beauty preservatives as frequently given by her when the invariable question was asked:

"Every woman should spend at least half an hour a day in seclusion for spiritual reflection.

"Walking is as good exercise as any I know.

"Women with nothing to do become quarrelsome and catty. Keep occupied.

"To be intellectual does not mean that one must be a scarecrow.

"Spiritual activity from mental cultivation gives grace, health, and animation to every curve of the body."

Those of her fellow-professionals who were associated with Lillian Russell speedily became her appreciative friends, and the appended tribute from that veteran of the stage, Francis Wilson, which appeared in the New York Tribune, will give some idea of the impression made upon them by her beauty, her character, and her professional gifts:

"I don't care how young Lillian Russell was when she died—and she was a mere child of sixty-one—her life went out too soon. With a printer-editor father and a mother long, long ago deeply, militantly interested in woman suffrage, hers was never the narrow atmosphere of the tenement, but of the world.

"Acclaimed early as a beautiful creature to whom women as well as men rendered willing homage, Lillian Russell from early girlhood to the hour of her death moved in a court of beauty of which she was the undisputed queen. She became a national institution and, as has been well said of her, 'the legend of her loveliness will linger gratefully through long years to come.'

"I knew her well in professional life, for I had played Caddy to her Ermine in one of that opera's revivals at the Casino. She was courteous, kind, and considerate and had a total absence, as far as my knowledge extended, of that temperamental something which is often better named as a temper born of egotism, and which makes sometimes the life of a manager anything but a bed of roses.

"I have always been a great admirer of Lillian Russell—of her beauty, talent, her good humor and unflinching common sense; but most of all I admired her unflinching courage and her outspoken condemnation of the injustices under which the people of her profession suffered. As she stood upon the platform with other women of her profession—with Mrs. Shelley Hull, Katherine Emmett, Marie Dressler and Ethel Barrymore—and said fearlessly what she thought and where she stood in the struggle then at its height, she was no longer the Lillian Russell famed for her beauty and her talent, she was Lillian Russell, the champion of the rights of her profession. At that moment those of us who had loved her for her many fine qualities changed that feeling into one of adoration."

FAMOUS NOVELS PICTURIZED.

I learn from the press that the Goldwyn-Erlanger organization is going to embark at once upon the production of "Ben Hur." The producers will very wisely stage the exterior scenes in Palestine; some of them, also, in Italy, thus giving the necessary effect of historical remoteness. And besides, it will mean much to the devout that they are gazing upon the scenes depicted by General Wallace with their true background; the background of the Holy Land that the fine old American warrior pictured so well in his novel.

General Wallace was not a great writer, but he certainly was a famous one. The dramatization of "Ben Hur," which rather cut into the dignity of the original story, had astonishing vitality, considering its faults; partly because of the religious element, which appealed—and will appeal in the picturized play—to large numbers of the habitually devout, who have no particular taste for the theatre, and only go when some theme of a biblical origin is used in drama, and the play attracts attention by its success.

But "Ben Hur" reminds me of another novel by General Lew Wallace, "The Fair God," which assuredly should lend itself to picturized effects. Mr. Movie Producer, I'll make you a handsome present of the suggestion to look up that old novel about the Aztecs in the days of their magnificence, when their now extinct civilization shone with splendor.

It was a time when the invaders came from across the sea, in search of gold and gems, and there is a really touching story of youth and innocence connected with the siege of their ancient city.

For that matter, there are plenty of old novels yet by other authors full of possibilities. Take Charles Reade alone. Several of his books offer great possibilities. Take "Never Too Late to Mend," "Griffith Gaunt," "Foul Play."

Some producer has selected Flaubert's "Salambo," has he not? If not, some one ought to get busy at rendering the barbaric yet civilized drama—civilized in its art and magnificence, savagely barbaric in its cruelties—of that wonderful Carthaginian prose epic, some of which is too terrible to reduce to drama; but all of which is magnificent, bizarre, grandiose.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

A PERSIAN TRAGEDY.

Suddenly I heard steps in the room. They were those of a young Persian princess whom I recognized as the "Queen of the Crowns," celebrated for her great beauty, which she was willingly destroying for the opium that made her forget her sorrows.

Her story was known to all Persia. According to the custom of her people, when she was eleven years old, she was married to a young prince of the court. At the end of two years, her husband was told that she was now old enough to be his wife, and she was led to his apartments. But the prince, a young gallant of twenty-three years, was not at all interested in the timid child. He accepted her with every courtesy and continued his usual life of gayety outside the walls of his house.

The young wife suffered torments. She loved him, while he, too careless for scorn, did not think of her at all. Too proud to plead, she endeavored to hide her anguish. But when, after days of loneliness, she saw him returning, happy, she upbraided him, threatening to kill him and to kill herself.

The young prince found himself married to a whirlwind that upset his whole household. At length he perceived a happy road by which he might escape such turmoil and again live in peace. Pretending to adore her, he remained at her side, lavishing upon her all the tendernesses of love, while he taught her the delights of the drug that destroys realities and fills the mind with fantastic and delicious dreams. His young wife soon learned to give her days and her nights to opium, and the prince returned to his courtesans.

Thus four years passed, and the princess was a woman. One day her husband passed through her apartment and was struck motionless by her beauty. She had bloomed like a flower. The prince took her in his arm and covered her face with kisses. She remained indifferent. Chilled by her coldness, he left her apartment. But from that moment he was unable to erase her image from his mind. He abandoned his friends, dismissed his dancers, and remained in his own house, trying by every art to win the love of this woman. Hoping to melt her coldness by arousing her former jealousy, the prince announced to her that, in accordance with Musulman custom, he was about to take other wives. But the "Queen of the Crowns," while the musicians were playing at the marriage feast in the house of the new bride, went before the cadi and divorced herself from her husband.—Armen Ohanian in Asia Magazine.

The Columbia Theatre.

The centre of theatrical interest this week has been Frank McGlynn and John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln."

When the Drinkwater play was first produced in this country it was given at Stamford, Connecticut. Despite a cold, rainy night the audience packed every inch of space. The second episode had scarcely passed before every one knew that here was great acting in a more than notable play. The public and the players were all prepared to greet the famous men of Lincoln's time, who appear in the course of the play, and each of them received their welcome as they came on the stage.

Robert E. Lee has always had the respect of the people of the North, but on this opening night another phase of the feeling for Lee was made evident. When, in the person of James Durkin, Lee came upon the stage, the Northern audience received him with such applause that the action of the play was stopped. This was very startling to the players, for it was unexpected, and for the time threw them off their balance. However, after that first time they were prepared and the same applause is in evidence at almost all performances.

The attraction to follow "Abraham Lincoln" at the Columbia Theatre is Rida Johnson Young's comedy romance, "Little Old New York," in which Isabelle Lowe and Creighton Hale will play the leading roles. Among the others in the cast are Dorothy Blackburn, Walter Scott Weeks, John Miljan. The play is set in the period of 1830.

"Little Old New York" will introduce to you John Jacob Astor, who buys up most of Manhattan at an astounding bargain, and it is now providing a revenue for his heirs; Washington Irving, the handsome young dreamer, who wastes time scribbling in a land where there is so much to be done; Cornelius Vanderbilt, the young ferryman, enthusiastic about running a boat from New York to Albany; Peter Delmonico, who sells sandwiches at the tavern from a basket, little dreaming of the famous restaurant which would bear his name.

This is the comedy of the Manhattan islanders when Maiden Lane was a blackberry patch, Brooklyn an Indian settlement, Yerba Buena sparsely settled, and California practically unexplored.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Edith Taliaferro is one of the best known of the country's legitimate actresses, and her present skit, "Under the Same Old Moon," is a massive production with a wonderful cast and scenic effects.

It has been many a day since San Francisco has heard such a tenor as John Steel. He has been an unqualified hit with every one who has heard him and his final week will be all too short to accommodate the people who wish to listen to him.

"Dick" Coburn is one of the country's greatest song writers. He has had his name on probably as many popular hits as any man in his profession. He has an entirely new idea in the presentation of popular songs.

The Sewell Sisters have an attractive dance fantasy in three scenes which was written by the popular authors, Neville Flesoon and Albert von Tilzer.

Truly Shattuck and Emma O'Neil are well-liked entertainers. They have a brand new turn for their current showing.

Margaret McKee is a California girl who went East and made a hit whistling. She has studied and worked out her art as an opera star would.

Kane and Herman, "the Midnight Sons," have proved themselves a startling hit in the fun line.

The Three Danoise Sisters perform some startling feats with an unusual amount of daring and agility.

The Players Theatre.

Evelyn Vaughan, for many seasons leading woman at the Alcazar, and a San Francisco favorite, is to return to the legitimate stage. This announcement will be of unusual interest to her many friends and admirers. Her vehicle will be the play by Henry Myers, "The First Fifty Years," the feature of the current New York theatrical season, which will be presented here by Reginald Travers and William S. Rainey at the Players Theatre for two weeks, commencing August 7th.

It is doubtful if Miss Vaughan has ever had a play so well suited to her ability as this realistic story of married life. It depicts in seven episodes the lovers on their wedding day, and then in turn the anniversaries from the first, the paper wedding, to the fiftieth, the golden wedding. On each anniversary they question their hearts. The frankness and truthfulness of the young author in his treatment of these scenes is one of his most powerful characteristics.

William S. Rainey is to play opposite Miss Vaughan. He has recently returned from New York, where he appeared as leading man in two Broadway productions this season,

"The Spring," by George Cram and "The Red Geranium," by Ruth Godward.

The Pacific Players.

The Pacific Players are to give "The Boor," by Anton Tchekoff, the Russian writer who is sending good comedies out of his distressed country. "The Baby Carriage," by Bosworth Crocker, is laid in the New York Jewish settlement.

The production, under the direction of Nathaniel Anderson, takes place at Sorosis Hall Little Theatre, 536 Sutter Street, evening of July 28th.

Seattle's Pageant.

"The Wayfarer," a stupendous American pageant, in which 3000 actors and 2000 trained singers will take part upon the world's largest stage, will be presented in the stadium of the University of Washington at Seattle, July 24th to 29th.

The performance will be held under the auspices of the Associated Students of the University of Washington. The scenery, costumes, and lighting effects to be used in the drama cost $250,000.

The play deals with the epochal periods of the world's history, starting in Babylonian times, and features the coming of the Messiah, the triumphant entry into Jerusalem, and the Crucifixion. Five thousand persons take part in the scene depicting the Golden Age, when all nations, creeds, and races gather around a gigantic illuminated cross.

Special reduced rates for the round trip from all points on its lines in California and Oregon to Seattle have been announced by the Southern Pacific Company. Tickets from California points will be on sale July 20th, 21st, and 22d, with final return limit August 31st.

VANITY FAIR.

Post-war parasitism appears to have gone the limit in London, and again "it is the woman that pays, and pays, and pays." It used to be the man. London Answers thus disgustingly discusses the matter: The age-old custom which compelled the man to bear the expenses incurred by his lady friend when they are on pleasure bent together is losing its hold on many of the young men of England. And, what is more remarkable, members of the fair sex, instead of showing resentment, are voluntarily surrendering this, their birthright. This surprising change can be noticed by a close observer at any restaurant or public dance in any town on any day of the week. Watch the couples who are on the friendliest terms at luncheon or dinner and you will often see the lady pass money to her man friend as the waiter places the bill before him. It may be that she has decided to pay half the expenses and that the money covers her share only. But sometimes it represents more than her share, and meets the expenses of both, including a liberal tip to the waiter. Until recently, few men would accept money from ladies in public without an apology and a very red face. But the young men who today take the money of their lady friends do so openly without exhibiting any feelings of embarrassment. At dances the new custom also prevails, but is not so apparent. Sometimes it comes as a shock to one of the men present.

The first indication of this habit of the new man-about-town came as a great surprise recently to the handsome, debonaire son of a British peer. He is a perfect dancer, and much sought after by London hostesses, because of his chivalry in dancing with those ladies who usually have more than their share of sitting out. To make a break in the routine of invitation-dances, this heir to an ancient barony attended a popular subscription dance in a well-known London hotel. Seeing a plain young damsel sitting out with her parents, he invited her to dance with him. The young aristocrat enjoyed his dance immensely, for his lady partner was an accomplished dancer. At the conclusion, however, he received a shock when his fair partner proposed that he join her at another dance to be held in the hotel on that day week. "I hope you won't be offended at my suggesting it," she added; "but I would like you to know that I am willing to pay the expenses of both." Astonished at the unusual request, the young man pleaded a prior engagement as an excuse for not accepting the invitation. Nevertheless there are many young men who, far from feeling offended at a proposal of this nature, are only too ready to take full advantage of what the gods have offered. They regard themselves much in the same light as property-owners regard their houses in these days of house shortage. They set a premium on their personal attractiveness, and on the fact that they are good company and that they are excellent dancers. The prospective tenant seeking a house pays a premium to enter. Why should they not charge a premium for their society, seeing that there is a shortage of interesting young men, and particularly of young men who can dance really well? So they resolve to let the ladies pay. As a result, almost every post brings to a man of this type letters containing an invitation to a subscription-dance with the ticket inside, or a stall for the theatre, or the information that a table for two has been booked at some smart restaurant.

And the ladies? Though there are still many companionless girls of means who expect the man always to pay, there are others—and their numbers are growing—who consider it only fair that they should contribute towards the expenses of their own pleasure. "I have as much money as he has, why shouldn't I pay sometimes? The man soon becomes tired of the girl who expects him to be always dipping into his pockets for her train fares, cabs, dance tickets, or suppers." This is typical of the arguments put forward by the freethinkers among modern girls when members of the fair sex are discussing the ever-popular subject of their amusements. There is another type of young woman who pays from motives other than to keep friendly with an interesting and accomplished young man. She is of the order that a decade ago swelled the ranks of the Suffragettes. She pays not for the sake of the man, but to preserve her own self-respect. She argues on these lines: "I am a woman, the equal of the man, and not his inferior. I earn my living by my labor even as he does. While I hate men who are parasites on women, I also despise women who are content to be parasites on men. I pay, not to save his pocket, but to maintain my own independence." The women of this type are also unquestionably on the increase. Their attitude is the logical outcome of the great movement for the emancipation of women which has been in progress in Britain during the past thirty years. The changing custom, however, is not without its dangers. Some of the men who unprotestingly allow the woman to pay all the expenses have developed into the most contemptible of parasites. It was the custom for men to pay because woman had no money and no means of earning it. Though the women of today earn more than the women of past generations, the men have not lost their earning powers.

The girl who readily parts with some of her modest income for the benefit of a man who professes to be badly off will be singled out, sooner or later, as a fit subject for fleecing by some one who has no principles, continues Answers. At every public dance, and not infrequently at private dances as well, there are some unprincipled men who have come with the intention of preying on women with money. These men are good dancers and have charming manners. They dance, not with the fascinating girls, but with the wallflowers. Having discovered those who have a little money, they carefully set to work to use their charm to extract it from them. Their methods are a refined exploitation of the confidence trick. They do not ask for money, but they take care, by suggestion, to let their lady friends know they are out of funds. These professional parasites are careful not to advance too quickly in their scheme of "fleecing the innocents." Having diplomatically acquainted their lady friends of the emptiness of their own pockets, they immediately offer to pay the next bill that comes along. When the large-hearted woman intervenes, they protest that their high breeding and sense of propriety is badly hurt by having to submit to accepting money from the other sex. Yet they always submit! In many cases, their lady friends go farther and proffer more money to help them over temporary embarrassments. These loans, of course, are rarely repaid. Instead, the "gallants in distress," when they find there is no more money forthcoming, take themselves away to other hunting grounds. Sometimes they leave their fair benefactors with aching hearts as well as with depleted purses.

Dispatches from Paris to the British press still deal with fashions, despite the fact that in this country the dictatorship of the French capital is declining. But that is because Americans can make their own clothes, but did you ever see any made in England? The latest convulsion is said to have hit the sleeve. Sleeves are now tremendous in extent, involving vast quantities of material. It is said that they have grown steadily wider, and last month they ran amuck altogether. Tudor sleeves, kimono sleeves, were left far behind. It is not only possible to make a whole dress from one sleeve, but a dress with a train. Sometimes, in the new tea gowns, the sleeve is a train, trailing on the ground, with the arm emerging somewhere amidsthips. Such gowns are for afternoon. For evening wear, the sleeves may be dispensed with, or only one worn. A white satin dress described by one astonished witness had a black slash down the bodice, a black tulle belt worn low like a cowboy's gun belt and fastened with a large jewel, and a small black sleeve on one side. It was just as "cute!" The other arm was protected from the weather by a jet bracelet. The effect must have been a good deal like that of a shirt that had been horribly mutilated in the wash, but had to be worn in an emergency. Fantasies in sleeves have been followed by some in skirts. The crisis that arose a few months back about the feminine equator, or waist line, appears to have been resolved by setting it very much in the south. The waist is to be worn low. The latest skirts are said to be lower in the waist than any skirt can be and retain its skirtly character. Sometimes there is a dip behind, over which the upper part balloons, giving the effect of a cape cut narrow at the bottom and gathered in by its wearer. Such skirts are fairly long, and much decorated with beads and woolen embroidery, dangling strings and perhaps a sporran. Sashes are being used. In color, gowns show violent chromatic struggles in Chinese blue and Indian red, put on here and there in patches. It may seem incredible, but in the field of fashion nothing is incredible. The general messiness reminds one of some of the atrocities of English architecture.

M. E.-L. Bouvier, distinguished French scientist, member of the Institute of France, Professor at the Museum d'Histoire Naturelle, disagrees with the charming recluse of Serignan, Fabre, though admiring him so greatly, in believing that instincts are not immutably fixed. In one chapter of his "Psychic Life of Insects," translated by Dr. L. O. Howard and published here by the Century Company, he instances a bee which, accustomed to line its cells with the red petals of the corn poppy (the insect's specific name being papaveris), nevertheless has been observed to substitute yellow, blue, or white flowers when a drought deprived it of the petal which generations of these bees had chosen. M. Fabre, in "The Wonders of Instinct," gives some truly appalling examples of the tragic stupidity of instinct unadapted to changed circumstances. With two such books side by side, it would seem that the question is an open one, with concessions due, perhaps, from each camp. Yet M. Bouvier is no "nature fakir," attributing human motives and reason to his insects: indeed, his "Psychic Life of Insects" distinctly warns us that: "The more the insect seems to resemble us, the more unlike it is."

Pischkin, once chef of Emperor Nicholas, is now boiling rice, beans, and cocoa for hungry children in the American Relief Administration kitchen, which has just been opened in the former Imperial Palace at Tsarskoye-selo, says an Associated Press dispatch from Petrograd. Three thousand children daily are being fed from the stoves and copper kettles that once cooked delicacies for imperial dinners. Several servants of the former Czar are employed as kitchen workers.

At Creil, near Paris, there is a society of archers, with an annual competition for the original trophy given at the first meet of the society more than a thousand years ago.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

There have been times when Western chivalry has cracked. A Modoc County editor received from a woman contributor a tight roll of poetry entitled "I Wonder If He'll Miss Me?" He replied: "Dear Madame: If he does he should never be trusted with a gun again."

"Well, now that is not my idea of an owl," said a casual visitor in a bird-stuffer's shop, looking at one sitting on a perch in a rather dark corner. "Isn't it?" replied the bird-stuffer, dryly, peering up over his spectacles. "Well, it's God's anyhow." The owl was a live one.

Charged with stealing a shoat a young culprit faced a Tennessee judge. "If you would train him properly," said the judge to the boy's father, "he wouldn't be here." "Judge," said the father sadly, "I hev done trained that boy es proper es I kin, an I hev whaled him a dozen times, but he don't take trainin' good. He's allus a gittin' caught."

A young man and maiden were playing golf—the lady quite a novice—and had reached a hole which was on the top of a little hill. The youth ran up first to see the lie of the balls. "A stymie!" he shouted, "a dead stymie!" The young lady came up with a sniff. "Well, do you know," she said, "I thought I smelled something as I was walking up the hill!"

A Chicago efficiency maniac posted a notice in his works reading "Do It Now." Within twenty-four hours the cashier bolted with the contents of the office safe, his favorite stenographer ran off with his oldest son, the office boy threw the ink bottle into the electric fan, and the whole mechanical crew went on strike for more wages and a six-hour day. He is thinking of getting a new office motto but he can't find a comfortable one.

Grandfather Hotchkiss lent his grandson the money to buy a pony, on condition that the pony should be his until the debt was repaid. Long before that happy event, he met the young hopeful afoot one day, and the boy asked: "Grandpap, who does that pony I ride belong to?" "Why," said the old man, "it belongs to me until you pay for it. Don't forget that." The boy heaved a sigh of relief. "I just thought I'd tell you," he said, "that your pony fell into the quarry and broke his neck."

Two old settlers sat smoking in a cabin far away in the backwoods. No feminine presence ever graced that settlement, and domestic arrangements were primitive and rude. The conversation drifted from politics to cooking, and one of the confirmed bachelors said: "I got one o' them there cookery books once, but I never could do nothin' with it." "Too much fancy work about it?" asked the other. "You've hit it. Every one o' them recipes begun in the same way, 'Take a clean dish—,' and that settled me."

Lady Sitwell, mother of the present Sir George, tells this story: "When my husband and I were staying at a little Swiss hotel, there was an old spinster lady who rather bothered us by persisting in talking across the table. It was in the days of a long table d'hôte. Wishing to ingratiate herself, she leant across the table and said: 'I understand, Sir George, that you are of royal descent. From which of the sovereigns are you descended?' Sir George, wishing to shut her up, curtly responded: 'From Queen Elizabeth, mum!'"

At one of the New England golf clubs a young lady who is very popular with her caddies arranged a match with an old woman who is proud of a mediocre ability. The young lady, a good player, wished to lose the game out of courtesy and for social reasons. Her opponent was in even worse form than usual and the girl grew desperate. She seemed unable to prevent her opponent from losing. Finally she told her caddy that she would like to lose the match. "Ah, miss," he muttered, "I didn't know that. Here I've been stamping on her ball every time it gets in the long grass."

Little Dorothy, with her mother, was paying a visit to Uncle Silas. Now, Uncle Silas was wealthy—very wealthy—and little Dorothy was vastly interested in the beathen. So one morning she appeared in front of uncle, and asked: "Uncle, dear, will you please give me something for my missionary box?" The incident took place immediately following a particularly satisfying lunch, and Uncle Silas playfully threw on the dining-room table a threepenny-bit, a two-shilling-piece, and a five-pound note, remarking: "There, dear, you can have which you like of the three." Then he watched to see what little Dorothy would do. That young person approached the table and studied the situation for fully three seconds. Then she suddenly burst out: "Mummy's always told me not to be greedy, so I'll take the littlest one. But will you please wrap it up in that crinkly bit of paper, uncle, so as I shan't lose it?" And uncle did.

Mr. G. B. Burgin, in his recently published "Memoirs," relates the following anecdote: A short time ago Stephen Leacock was the guest of a literary club to which I belong, and when I was called on to speak I explained how that morning I had been walking in Highgate Cemetery and paused by the tomb of Lord Strathcona. One of the cemetery custodians joined me, and said, regretfully, "Lord Strathcona's the only distinguished Canadian we have here." Then he brightened up a little. "But there's a vacant lot beside his lordship." Whereupon I explained to him curiously enough that I was going to meet another distinguished Canadian that evening, and would try to induce him to make the necessary arrangements for occupying the vacant space by Lord Strathcona. Leacock listened to this with strained attention. On rising to reply, he disregarded the points made by the other speakers, and said: "Whilst I am deeply grateful to Mr. Burgin for his thoughtful arrangements regarding my obsequies, I regret to inform him that they will have to be canceled, as I have already decided to be buried in Westminster Abbey."

The first sun dial was erected in Rome, and the day was first divided into hours, in 293 B. C.

Beautiful Venus de Milo,
Sickly and crippled and sad;
Has no more arms than a silo—
Some think she never has had.
She can not rank with the Flapper;
Scientists give her this slap:
For whatever their charms
Marble marms,
Without arms,
Can not be expected to flap.

Beautiful Venus de Milo;
Worried, neglected, alone;
Known from Honduras to Hilo—
Well and quite fav'ably known—

The Lure of Paris.

The fairy-tale of Paris belongs to all of us, in whatever terms it may be told, says Muriel Harris in the North American Review. For some it is Marie Antoinette and the Petit Trianon; and, curiously, by comparison with a rather worthless queen, the great war pales. For some it is Napoleon in his cocked hat and white breeches, and his great tomb, one of the fingertips of Paris. For still more it is the Bois and the elegance and luxury and beautiful women; and for the rest, there is always the particular application—the house where Balzac had his printing-press, or perhaps only a great stone wall, symbol of the centuries, over which a fruit tree blooms, symbol of centuries continually renewed. I can not think of any one for whom there is not in Paris some answering chord, some link with a great aggregate of humanity, which has lived and wrought and piled up history and romance and experience for two thousand years, all under the one banner of Paris. . . . We look at the depth and richness and inexhaustible suggestion of the Paris background; we are grateful for its stimulus, its inspiration. Only now and again do we realize that Roman and Frank and Gaul; Catholic and Huguenot; artist, priest and warrior; saint, martyr, philosopher, mid-nette, have really our energies in their grip and that, in the continuity of history, such creation as we can accomplish is their work, their inspiration—all but that infinitesimal fraction which is ourselves.

According to Russian advices to the Paris Temps, the acreage under agricultural products in Poland, which in 1913 amounted to 12,000,000 hectares or about 29,000,000 acres, had been reduced in 1919 by 3,500,000 hectares, or about 30 per cent. Since 1919, however, the 3,500,000 hectares lying fallow had been reduced to 1,213,000 in the spring of 1921, and to 600,000 in the present season.

The MOTOR OIL FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of CYCOL as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Daisy Canfield Danziger, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Danziger of Los Angeles, to Mr. Bruce Hay Chapman, son of Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Hay Chapman, has been announced. The wedding will take place August 15th in the south. A wedding tour to Honolulu is planned. Miss Danziger is in San Francisco for a few days, returning from an Eastern trip, and Mr. Chapman, who makes his home in the south, is visiting his parents at their Clay Street home.

Miss Laura Sanborn, daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Sanborn of Fruitvale, and Mr. Alfred J. Harwood were married on Monday, July 3d, at San Jose. The marriage was a surprise to their friends. Mrs. Harwood is a sister of Miss Grace Sanborn and of Mr. John Sanborn and Mr. Clarence Sanborn and the late William Sanborn. Mr. Harwood is a lawyer in San Francisco, and Mr. and Mrs. Harwood expect to make their home here.

The open-air theatre on the estate of Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore at Santa Cruz will be the setting for the wedding ceremony of Miss Josephine Moore and Mr. Dean Dillman of Sacramento. The marriage will be solemnized during the first week of September. The wedding procession will come from the house through the grounds to an altar erected in the theatre. Miss Moore has chosen for her attendants Mrs. Sydney Van Wyck Peters as her matron of honor, Miss Alice Hanchett, Miss Lucy Hanchett, Miss Dorothy Crawford and Miss Corinne Dillman, a sister of the groom, as bridesmaids. Mrs. Peters, Miss Moore's matron of honor, prior to her marriage a year ago was Miss Marie Louise Winslow of San Francisco. Since her marriage she has made her home in Portland, and is coming down the latter part of August in time for the wedding.

On Wednesday evening, July 12th, Miss Maude Fay and Captain Powers Symington, U. S. N., were married at the home of Archbishop Edward J. Hanna, the reception following at the old Fay home on Grove Street. Mrs. George A. Cameron and Mrs. Marshall Dill attended Miss Fay. Mr. Thomas Symington acted as best man for his brother. The Symington family arrived from their Eastern homes on Sunday to attend the wedding, and included Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Symington, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Symington, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Symington, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Symington and Miss Patty Symington, a sister of Captain Symington. Captain and Mrs. Symington will make their home in the East, so the affairs given in their honor before their marriage were farewells. Last Friday Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Jackling entertained at dinner for the engaged couple, a dinner party given by Mr. and Mrs. George A. Cameron on Monday and a luncheon party on Sunday, given by Mr. and Mrs. Nion Tucker, followed.

The Burlingame Country Club has been the setting for a large number of affairs over the holidays and the week-end following. On July 4th there was a large no-host dinner party with dancing afterward. Among those who attended were Mr. and Mrs. George T. Marye, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Newhall, Colonel and Mrs. Sidney Cloman, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph D. Grant, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mr. and Mrs. George Cameron, Mr. and Mrs. Fentress Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Atholl McBean, Mr. and Mrs. George Barr Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Mountford S. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. James Keeney, Mrs. George Harding and Mrs. Daniel Murphy.

Mrs. Gertrude Strong Achilles gave a reception and tea Thursday for her two sons, Mr. Achilles Achilles of Maryland and Mr. Paul Achilles of New York, who are guests at her home near Morgan Hill.

Mr. and Mrs. Willis Walker and their son, Mr. Léon Brooks Walker, entertained a number of house guests over the holiday at their Pebble Beach home. Miss Mary Martin, Miss Lawton Filer, Miss Edith Grant and Miss Edna Taylor, Mr. William Magee, Jr., Mr. Harry Crocker, Mr. Paul Kennedy and Mr. Stanley Armour of Chicago were among the guests.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling are at their cottage on the Lawson estate at Woodside for the summer. Over the week-end and the Fourth Mr. and Mrs. Jackling entertained Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Rutherford, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Allen. Miss Ruth Hobart and Miss Marjorie Josselyn motored down in time for a picnic luncheon.

Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Mullins entertained at a dinner at the Montecito Golf and Country Club Tuesday evening for their daughter, Mrs. John Rodgers Clark, and their granddaughter, Miss Dorothy Clark, who are visiting them at "La Vista" in Santa Barbara. Mr. Donald Strandberg, who accompanied the Clarks on their trip south, was also a guest.

By holding the enemy property which still remains in the hands of the alien property custodian as collateral security, or a pledge, to secure the payment by Germany and Austria and their nationals of the numerous claims in the hands of American citizens, says Joseph Conrad Fehr in the North American Review, the United States would not only safeguard the interests of its own nationals, but would also thereby insure to these former enemies the ultimate return of their property retained in America. This method would enable America to solve this problem upon principles that are at once just to all concerned and at the same time will result in the gradual disposition of enemy property back to former enemy owners who are now permitted by Section 9 of the Trading with the Enemy Act to present their claims before the proper authorities for allowance.

Marsh Pools.

And now I know
Where are those stars
That slip like jewels
Between the night's Most jealous fingers.
At dusk I found them,
Where the marsh had hidden them—
In a silver pocket
Of her gray-green gown!
—Frances Dickenson Pinder in Poetry.

In a Charleston Garden.

I love old gardens best—tired old gardens that rest in the sun.

There the rusty tamarisk and knotted fig trees lean on the wall, and paper-whites break rank to wander carelessly among tall grasses.
The yellow roses
climb down from the trellises, and the wistaria goes adventuring to the neighboring trees.

The forgotten comfort of the wilderness comes again.
The legend of the twisted walks is broken, and the marble seats are green
like woodland banks.

—Henry Bellmann in the Reviewer.

The Grandfather.

There's a kind of morning prayer
In the air
That recalls the song and praise
Of other days,
And the lilacs all in bloom,
And the sunny breakfast-room—
Open windows to the ground
All around;
Lawns a-glitter with the dew,
Scents from many a field and flower
In that early, quiet hour
Greeted you.

For, in coming down the stairs
You could smell delicious airs,—
The whole country-place seemed theirs;
Were they creeping in to prayers,
Or passing through,
Or visiting the vases freshly set
On the mantel, in the corner cabinet?
Was it lilies, was it pinks or mignonette?
What they were I'll hardly say—
Roses, roses anyway!
I smell them yet.

Just a morn like this, and then Came the maids (there were no men)
One or two
Decent maids; then jolly children not a few.
And with shuffling of the chairs
They prepared the place for prayers,
Rumping through;
And scarcely grew more tame
When the silent moment came.
For they knew
When Grandpapa appeared
He was little to be feared
By the crew.
And their mothers were in bed.
(For surely for such notions
As family devotions
There's little to be said.)

So the ancient prayers were read
By that brilliant-eyed old man,
Full of reverence, full of grace,
To the children of his clan
In the quaint old country-place
That had nursed the elder race
With its bloom.
And he kneeled where they had kneeled,
And the odors of the field
Filled the room.

—John Jay Chapman in Scribner's Magazine.

Song of Praise for Not Being a Poet.

I have heard fountains singing in the grass;
I have seen rainbows thrilling to the sun;
I have felt south winds dancing as they pass—
All joy is one!

I have touched heaven's radiance with a star;
I have drunk earth's brown vintage with a tree;
I have plucked splendors where the lightnings are—

Beauty is free!

I have chased angels on a sea gull's wing;
I have learned laughter from the spinning spheres;
Yet I, who am no poet, need not sing
Or care who hears!

Ah, happy is the owner of the sky
Who is not exiled by the flaming sword
To seek the phrase that paints it till he die, Slave of the Word!

—Anne O'Hare McCormick in the New Republic.

Trade with Canada.

In coming to closer grips with the question of possible trade relations between the United States and Canada, says Sir George E. Foster in the North American Review, we must accept as a basis the facts above mentioned. These summarized are that, geographically and climatically, both countries along a wide range of contiguous territory produce similar commodities and generally in surplus quantities; that each country has the easiest and quickest recourse to very important sources of supply in the other; that both countries base their tariffs on the principle of protection and the practice of preferential treatment within the family; that both have strong aspirations towards national growth and development and thus combine national and economic considerations in the determination of their fiscal policy, and that, while freely acknowledging these fundamentals and being guided thereby, both peoples have the most cordial friendship towards each other and a desire to do the largest amount of trade with each other possible under conditions as detailed above.

THE GLOOMY DEAN.

The courage of the Dean [William Ralph Inge] is not a mixture of soft-hearted and soft-headed eccentricity, says John Bailey in the London Times. It is not enough for him that his courage should be the courage of his convictions; it must also be the courage of his brains, his common sense, his serious thought and knowledge. Those things do not make a man infallible; but they do make what he says worth listening to. It is only when he goes outside them, or when he attacks the Labor Party, of which in all probability he knows very little, that his words, though all the more quoted, are the less worth quoting.

But within these limitations, and with the necessary exceptions, he is at once one of the bravest and one of the most interesting thinkers of the day. He holds one of the most dignified positions in the Church of England, and is probably the most interesting man, except one, who has held it since the Reformation.

Now, in this Rede Lecture, he exhibits what may, perhaps, be a more difficult courage still—that of his elderliness. He is over sixty, and was over forty when Queen Victoria died—that is, he is a Victorian; and he is not in the least anxious to conceal it. On the contrary, he rejoices in the opportunity afforded to him by this lecture of giving a very vigorous defense of the faith that is in him, and incidentally showing, as he has often shown before, his thorough understanding of the military doctrine that the best defense is lively offense.

Like every other age, the Victorian left unsolved problems, which it never saw to be problems, to its successor. The worst of them is not the low wages, or even the long hours, which make so much talk, but the one on which the Dean rightly lays all his stress—the monotony of life under the industrial system, which has evolved a kind of workman who has nothing to do which he can take pride or pleasure in doing. To that the Victorian Age was almost wholly blind, in spite of Ruskin.

Does anybody today really doubt that the Victorian Age, as a whole, ranks, as Dean Inge says, with the Elizabethan as the greatest this country has known?

In particular, who doubts the greatness of its literature? The notion that all or most of the young doubt it, is, so far as my experience goes, a complete delusion; in fact, I fancy nobody does, except those who, knowing none but contemporary literature, are no judges of that, and still less of any other. The last of all to doubt it are, I suspect, those who are most for what is finest in the literature of today. Go, for instance, to the people who know that few poets have given us a more sensitive and delicate interpretation, whether of nature or of spirit, than Mr. de la Mare, and that there are few novels in which the powers of imagination and style are exhibited as they are in those of Mr. Conrad. Will you find them either scorning or ignoring the great Victorians?

MOTORS AND RAILROADS

The Connecticut highway authorities have begun surveys for a highway from Bridgeport to the New York State line, which, if it is constructed, will be restricted to the exclusive use of motor trucks, says the New York Herald. The route will practically parallel the Boston Post road, and it is confidently believed by the officials of Connecticut that if the construction of the road is authorized New York State will build a continuation of it to New York city. The United States Bureau of Public Roads is said to be in favor of the enterprise.

Freight transportation by truck has reached such volume that for several years there has been serious congestion on the Boston Post road. It is declared by Motor Travel that 10,000 vehicles make use of this highway every day. Of these 2000 are commercial motor trucks. There is no indication that the number of vehicles will be reduced; on the contrary, there is every reason to expect it will be increased. When good times come and the industrial plants in the country tributary to the Boston Post road are running at top speed the transportation problem will be more difficult than it has been in the slack times through which the country has been passing.

The use of motor trucks in the Connecticut factory district has cost the railroads hundreds of thousands of tons of freight. The proposal to build a highway especially for the trucks will bring up in concrete form questions of taxation and franchise rights that have already been raised but have generally been ignored. The railroads pay great sums in taxes for the right to the transportation business of the country. Heretofore the competitive truck companies have generally escaped this burden. If a highway for the trucks is built out of the public treasures the railroads will of course help to pay for its construction and maintenance, unless some way is found to put its cost on its users.

Toll roads have fallen into unpopularity in the United States, yet the virtue embodied in the principle on which they were constructed is recognized in such imposts as the car fee paid by trolley corporations for the use of public bridges and in the tolls to be charged for use of the tunnels from New York City to Jersey City. Perhaps in some adaptation of the toll system will be found a means to distribute fairly the cost of highways for freight. This would meet the objection often raised to use of highways in one state by gainfully employed vehicles owned by residents of another state.

Russian Religion.

It is clear that the Russian revolution will have profound effects upon the religious life of the country, says the Manchester Guardian. Representative men in all the churches of England signed lately a protest to the Soviet government against its attack on the head of the Russian church, the Patriarch Tikhon. Our correspondent, Mr. Arthur Ransome, in an article which we are printing, explains that the forced retirement of the patriarch and the violence done to other priests are one incident only in a deepening breach not so much between church and government as between two schools of thought within the church itself.

The government has sought to commandeer the valuables of the church to feed the starving. A section of the clergy, backed by a circular from the patriarch, have offered resistance, and have paid dearly for it. They are bitterly opposed within their own ranks by churchmen who believe the time is ripe for reform of service and organization—for the use of the vernacular, for stripping the church of vain pomps and ceremonies; in short, for a popular religious revival. Such an outcome might well have far-reaching results, for its course would tend to run clear both of the old conservatism in church affairs and of the doctrines of communism.

Real Conservation.

"That much abused word 'conservation' has two meanings, totally opposite," says Edwin E. Slosson, in the Science News Bulletin. "Conservation in some cases means using and conservation in other cases means not using. The legislator with his agate-bearing tongue will talk of the 'conservation of our coal and water-power' just as though the two things were alike and required the same treatment. It is just as absurd as if a man should ask a painter to have his house painted 'the color of snow and ink,' for the conservation of coal means saving it, for what is not used today will be of use tomorrow. The conservation of water-power, on the contrary, means using it, for what is not used today will be lost forever.

"The greatest waste is our failure to utilize, not our carelessness in methods of utilization. We waste 50 per cent. of our petroleum through irrational and competitive drilling. We waste two-thirds of our coal before its energy gets into the engine. But we waste all of the sunshine that falls upon our arid region lands, and that means a greater loss of energy than we get from all our oil and coal. The richest region in the United States is Death Valley, California. Even the green leaves are not able to catch and incorporate more than one per cent. of the power of the sunshine that falls upon them. If some one would invent a solar engine with an efficiency of five per cent. it would add incalculably to the wealth of the country through the utilization of the wasted sunbeams that fall upon our arid land.

"Here is a prize bigger than any grasped by coal kings and oil magnates. But nobody comes forward to claim it. Yet very likely the knowledge necessary to achieve this supreme triumph of chemical engineering is already in existence—somewhere.

"If it is not, there is certainly enough brain-power in the world to solve the problem if it were set to work at it. We are all of us the poorer because of this waste of ideas and inventive genius."

A Real Toiler.

We have just had "in our midst," as the nervous toastmaster says, one Samuel Matthews Vauclain, of the great manufacturing city of Philadelphia, and it should have done us much good to have him. He is a tonic element, and a typical American personal force, and his views of matters industrial are well worth attention. He startled the wavering and the hesitant by the declaration that prosperity is already here, notwithstanding the coincidence of two rather serious-looking strikes. To him, there is no other country so wonderful, no other government so good, and the farther west he came the better things were. Vauclain is one of the big men of the nation, and one of the men that make a nation big—in the best sense of the term; big in courage, high in heart, confident in outlook and confident in the strength and value of its institutions. He manufactures little trinkets known as locomotives. In his office at the Philadelphia shops of the Baldwin Locomotive Works he wallows in work like a janitor with too many rooms to take care of, and when he sees that orders for his line of jewelry are about executed and no new ones have come in he packs his grip and sets sails for Mexico or Russia or China and gets more. It is his cure for hard times in the locomotive business, and it works. He is the original American go-getter. Business will come, or he will make it come; he won't wait for it. He began life as a workman in the shops, and he is the best possible demonstration of the reality of American opportunity. Those that think the day of opportunity has passed in this country are looking only at the mass. For the mass, things never looked especially brilliant in this world. But for any individual of the mass who is possessed of determination and intelligence and reliability and a sense of duty, and is not misled by crank theories about the submergence of the poor and the predatory disposition of the rich, there is plenty of opportunity if he will attend to his knitting—probably there is as much opportunity as Vauclain had in his youth, for there are certainly more arts and industries, and a field for far more varied talents. But the rewards will not come to dreamers and complainers. They only come to men that help do the work of the world, and help on a large scale, with courage and vision and hope. Vauclain is like that, a man of courage, and a democratic man, honoring work because he has done it, and still does it, himself. It may be said that such a man is working only for himself, but it will not be said by persons of discrimination and judgment; for a man that makes locomotives is working for humanity, and when he sells them abroad he is as good an internationalist as any member of the Third Internationale—whose very food and fuel has to be hauled to them by the locomotives such a man makes. After all, the real philanthropist is the great worker. Work will cure almost anything that ails us.

Applause.

Unless President Harding commits some serious blunder before he is out of office, history will have the pleasant task of acclaiming him one of the greatest of American Presidents. His dispatch to the governors of twenty-eight coal states, urging them to support his invitation to the coal mine operators to resume operations, and following so closely upon his rail strike proclamation of July 11th, is, with the exception of one unfortunate clause, a great state paper, and, in spite of that clause, places him upon the heights of statesmanship. It is based upon rights that are fundamental, expedient, essential, moral, no matter what defects may appear in and from their operation—rights humanity can not dispense with, and because of whose destruction people in Russia have been eating corpses.

The President has been patient, perhaps too patient, before issuing this dispatch. He invited a resumption of mining under a commission, with arbitration in view, and the invitation was rejected by the striking coal miners in a body, and by a small minority of the operators. The resources of official conciliation were thereby exhausted, and nothing remained but a stern assertion of fundamental rights, backed if necessary by the force of government. This assertion Mr. Harding has shown the courage to make. This force he calls on the governors to exert if necessary; with a pretty plain intimation that if they are too cowardly to do it the Federal government will. His style is, of course, more diplomatic than that, but that is what he means. The paws are velvet-smooth, but the claws are there. He says:

I trust you will find it consistent to second this invitation, if you have not already done so, with the invitation to all miners and operators to resume their work. The invitation should be accompanied by such assurance of maintained order and the protection of lawful endeavor as will give assurance to everybody concerned. I want to convey to you in this message the assurance of the prompt and full support of the Federal government whenever and wherever you find your own agencies of law and order inadequate to meet the situation. Your state government and the Federal government are responsible for maintained conditions under which free men, willing to work, may work in safety.

With this, the sentimental nonsense and palliation of murder in the supposed interest of the "exploited and oppressed" ought to stop. The "exploited and oppressed" can not be helped that way. Society can not be enriched by destroying the fundamental rights of property and of every free man to work when work is offered or cease to work when he no longer finds it to his interest to continue.

In many states the governors have fallen down. Len Small has done nothing to make Illinois safe for free labor. If Governor Stephens has done anything to make California safe for free labor we do not recall what it was. On the contrary, he declined, from a distance of 500 miles, to send troops to Roseville when they were quite obviously needed. That was not an act of courage. It is the tendency of the local politician, and most governors are merely local politicians, to conciliate the local labor vote, so protection is withheld, "for fear of provoking violence," when it is well known that without the presence of the militia, or some equivalent police, violence is an almost inevitable concomitant of strikes. That is cowardly. If state rights suffer in this exigency and in similar ones in the future, it will be because some governors have been unfaithful to their duty of maintaining "conditions under which free men, willing to work, may work in safety," and have through their political cowardice made it necessary for the Federal government to intervene on the ground of protecting interstate commerce. And that will be a bad development, but the governors will be to blame, not the President. It is not he that lacks the courage necessary to the maintenance of the proper autonomy of the states.

With the next proposition the President lays down the Argonaut finds it difficult to agree; that "we are responsible for the production and transportation of a fuel supply ample for the necessities of the American people," etc. That is dangerous doctrine, or at least it is a statement capable of a dangerous interpretation. It is what the socialists would like to see generally recognized, but it will not do, strictly speaking. What the government is responsible for is what other parts of the President's dispatch have so simply and strongly defined: defense of the rights of property, and of the right of free men to work in safety. That is enough. It is all the situation calls for, and it is the proper limit of the function of the government. To assert the government's responsibility for the production and transportation of fuel, even if done for the laudable purpose of enlisting the coöperation of the governors, is to assert the doctrine of collectivism, and that can not safely be asserted; it can not even be admitted. It would be a reaction and a retrogression toward the communistic condition of the cannibal islands; whose stage of civilization and comfort we should ultimately reach if we went far down that road.

Collegiate Vagrancy.

Of late the Argonaut has had more or less to say on the general subject of education, and from such a viewpoint education is and will remain a general subject, whose specifications are for the professional educator to define. It is not for journalism to say exactly what shall be taught in schools and colleges; it is enough for it to point to some scattering and expensive things that should not be. But while the Argonaut has been busy criticizing recent educational tendencies, it has not been alone, for the Secretary of State, Charles E. Hughes, has been pointing out to the National Education Association, meeting at Boston early this month, some of the ills that attend on the excessive sugar-coating of the educational pill. It is a coating that destroys the efficacy of the medicine, and should have no place in the pedagogic pharmacopœia. It takes the moral tonic out of any system of schooling to sweeten it and popularize it, as it cheapens and degrades it and robs it of its high authority and spiritual value to devote it to mere bread-and-butter purposes. Education made easy has lost 99 per cent. of its value. Education made "practical" has lost 50 per cent.; more than that, for it is the best half that is gone. In trying to recall the educators of the country to some sense of these the Secretary of State has remarkably paralleled the criticisms of this paper. He says, among other things:

I think that we have done too much to encourage intellectual vagrancy in college. Of course, there should be opportunity to select courses having in view definite scholastic aims, but we have gone so far that a college education, outside of technical schools, may mean little or nothing. It is a time for reconstruction and for the establishment of definite requirements by which there will be secured better mental discipline, more accurate information, and appropriate attention to the things of deepest value which make for the enrichment of the whole life of the student.

What we have seen going on in our own university, Secretary Hughes has seen elsewhere. Intellectual vagrancy is no better East than West. Our university has a grand opportunity to lead the way back to the fundamental things of the mind and spirit, and it ought to have the courage to do it, no matter who may call such a movement old-fashioned. The sentimentalist may sigh for heaven on earth and delude himself with the supposition that it can be attained through the destruction of existing social forms and conventions and laws, and at Berkeley there is a growing feeling of that sort among the younger students, whose vision is uncorrected and whose ideas are not gathered into any sound fabric by the scientific light and leading of older and better-trained minds. But this is the way the matter looks to our Secretary of State, an able, courageous, and sensible man, who might have been thinking of Berkeley itself as he said to the assembled teachers:

It is impossible to provide a system of general education and ignore the need of discipline. The sentimentalists are just as dangerous as the materialists. No one will dispute the importance of making study interesting, of recognizing the individual bent or special gifts. But the primary lesson for the citizens of democracy is self-control, and this is achieved only through self-discipline. As I look back upon my own experience I find that the best lessons of life were the hardest. Even along the line of special aptitude it is the severe mental exercise, the overcoming of real obstacles, that counts. My mother's insistence on the daily exercise in mental arithmetic has been worth more to me than all the delightful dalliings with intellectual pleasures I have ever had. Life is not a pastime and democracy is not a holiday excursion. It needs men trained to think, whose mental muscles are hard with toil, who know how to analyze and discriminate, who stand on the firm foundation of conviction which is made possible only by training in the processes of reason. The sentimentalists must not be allowed to ruin us by dissipating the energy that should be harnessed for our varied needs.

When we consider the true object of education, to give the training which will enable one to make the most—that is the best—of oneself, we must realize that the foundation should be laid in a few studies of the highest value, in self-discipline, and that there should be supplied every incentive to attain that mental and spiritual culture which connotes, not merely knowledge and skill, but character. This means self-denial, hard work, the inspiration of teachers with vision, and an appreciation of the privileges and obligations of citizenship in democracy.

No one that has had anything to do with hiring young people and attempting to make them useful in the scheme of things today can have failed to notice their general lack of discipline and reliability of character, and of accuracy in performance, which is the expression of these things. This lack demonstrates that something is wrong with our educational methods. It shows that snap studies with plenty of leisure for joy riding and jazzing somehow fail to fill the requirements. And this is no mere fancy on our part. The Secretary of State has seen it, and demands its correction, in these weighed and weighted phrases:

In the elementary schools it means that sort of training which insists, at whatever cost, on the mastery by the student of the subject before him, on accuracy—the lack of which, I regret to say, is now conspicuous in students of all grades—the correct use of our language, and the acquisition of that modicum of information which every one should possess.

In the secondary schools (our high schools and academies) it means that we should stop scattering. There is at present a bewildering and unsuccessful attempt at comprehensiveness. It fails of its purpose in giving neither adequate information nor discipline. It asks too much of the student, and too little. I believe that we need to have a few fundamental, substantial studies which are thoroughly mastered. I am one of those who believe in the classical and mathematical training, and I do not think that we have found any satisfactory substitute for it. But the important point is the insistence upon concentration and thoroughness. The function of the secondary school is not to teach everything, but really to teach something, to lay the basis for the subsequent, and more definitely specialized, intellectual endeavor.

These are not the words of a sensationalist. They are the utterances of one of the sanest of men, a towering figure with a world outlook in these confused, uncertain times. They concern every one of us, but they concern our State University most of all, for it sets the standard for the whole public school system of the state, and it is, moreover, the custodian of California's youth and California's future. There is more of this magnificent address, far more important and valuable and worthy of reprinting and free distribution in the Congressional Record than anything that has appeared in it for a long time; but we lack space for it all, and must conclude with these momentous passages:

We have given too scant attention to the demands of training for citizenship. This implies adequate knowledge of our institutions, of their development and actual workings. It means more than this in a world of new intimacies and complexities. It means adequate knowledge of other peoples, and for this purpose there is nothing to take the place of the humanities, of the study of literature and history. When I speak of the study of history I do not mean a superficial review, but the earnest endeavor to understand the life of people, their problems and aspirations. And at this time it is not simply or chiefly the history of a distant past that is most important to know; it is recent history, with sufficient acquaintance with the past to understand the extraordinary happenings and developments which have taken place in our own time, so that, through a just and clear discernment, our young men and women may properly relate themselves to the duties and opportunities of their generation.

We must not forget the many schools of experience, in one or more of which every American must take his course. But what we have regarded as the American character, that which we delight to praise as the dominant American opinion because of its clear, practical, and intelligent view of affairs, has resulted from the inter-action of the influence of the colleges and universities on the one hand and of these schools of experience on the other. We can not afford to do without either. And the most pressing need of our day is attention to the organization of American education.

Edisonian Money.

Mr. Edison is a practical person, but he ought to confine himself to his field, which is, in general, the application of electro-magnetism—with some little excursions into the making of motion pictures, phonographs, and cement—and leave money-tinkering to such economists as Mr. Bryan, Henry Ford, Moreton L. Frewen, and Coin Harvey. His recent essay toward the solution of the country's difficulties is far less practical than the cockroach electrocutor he invented when he was a telegrapher. And it is not particularly new.

The Jersey wizard proposes (he hates to be called a wizard, but he has brought it on himself in more ways than one) that the government build a system of concrete warehouses in which the producers of non-perishable basic commodities such as foodstuffs, metals, minerals, fibres and oils, may store their surplus as a pledge for currency up to half its value, to be calculated on the average price of the past twenty-five years. The other half of the value will be represented by a pawn ticket. The producer may, of course, sell the pawn ticket, or borrow money on it. If he wants the goods back within a year he can redeem them by presenting the pawn ticket and the amount of currency he borrowed; which the government will cancel. If he does not want them back, the government can sell them at the expiration of a year—for what it can get. This pleasant plan Mr. Edison supposes will supply us with a non-fluctuating "standard of value and medium of exchange," and make life rosy for the agriculturist.

It is difficult to see anything in it that the farmer can not do now, except what he should never be permitted to do at all, and that is to receive warehouse receipts that the government has decreed shall be legal tender. There are plenty of warehouses in the country already, and if there are not more will be built as soon as the fact becomes apparent, and warehouse receipts are pretty good collateral. The Edisonian currency would consist merely of such receipts, except for its legal tender character; and the vices of giving such a character to two different commodities, gold and another, the disturbances that would follow it under Gresham's law, became pretty well known to the country during the free silver craze that reached its peak in the nomination of Mr. Bryan for the presidency in 1896. The basis of the security would be extremely defective, so the margin would have to be high. No average, over a period of twenty-five years or any other, would supply a non-fluctuating standard. It could not provide against future changes of value. There is no power of prophecy in averages. They can not look ahead and tell us about the effect on values of such violent upheavals of society and industry as the recent European war and the blind gropings toward justice and stability that have followed.

doesn't need to be done, and the sorrows of humanity can not be alleviated in that manner, although much can be done in that manner to make them worse. Money is a wonderfully mobile and elastic thing. It moves with the speed of our swiftest modes of transportation from the place where it is abundant to the place where it is scarce, and the development of this mobility is one of the triumphs of the banking system. Like everything else, it conforms to the law of supply and demand; and thus responds automatically to the load put upon it. When it has additional work to do it rises in price, and so the prices of other things fall; and vice versa. In these fluctuations individuals get pinched for various sums, and their outcries are pathetic, but it can not be helped—they must take their chances; they are in the grip of forces mightier than the government or all governments severally or combined. Every once in awhile somebody thus pinched complains that his troubles arise from the fact that there is not enough money in the country to do the country's business, but he never says just how much is enough—because there is no such figure. Granting for argument's sake that government could increase or diminish the amount of money in the country, we can have either more money of less value or less money of more value, and hence it is useless to make the change, for it would only mean one more of those price disturbances in which the unwary come to grief. In response to the proportion of supply to demand, the value of money is changing every day, and that is bad enough without having the government make it worse by introducing artificial changes in response to class and political motives.

You can not make farming a bed of roses by monkeying with the country's money. Farming is hard work. No new form of currency will get up at 4 in the morning and milk the cows. Warehouse receipts, legal tender or not, will never make it rain in Kansas when it won't rain in Kansas, nor prevent it in the Argentine when it is due there. The farmer is a deserving person when he is a deserving person—just like the rest of us; and a wealth "beyond the dreams of avarice," a wealth of waving grass, and skies bending over broad landscapes, and the sweet scent of cut hay, and all the rest of that sort of thing, and time to think and feel in a natural manner, and good food on the table, and sound sleep o' nights, and hard muscles, and freedom from stiff collars and hard hats, is the farmer's to enjoy, and usually he is too tired to enjoy it; and that is too bad, but putting the government into the warehouse business, after its disastrous adventures in the shipping business and the railroad business, is not going to make it any better.

The farmer's main problems are not money problems, they are labor problems and market problems, and life problems. Mr. Edison has done a vast service to the farmer by his development of the electrical arts, by improving the telephone and the telegraph and the phonograph, by every one of his more than fifteen hundred inventions that has helped do our work and sweeten life. Mr. Ford has done a tremendous lot for the farmer by making cheap cars and tractors. That is real service. Doubtless Mr. Ford could do still more by producing cheap nitrates. But making cheap money will not help in any way that is permanent and general, although a few sharp persons might derive some advantage from it for awhile. And probably they would not be farmers.

Life and Taxes.

The hope of prosperity, and of independence in old age, is one of which the human heart can not be robbed with safety to society or to human happiness. We may not attain the prosperity, or the comfort in our declining years, but at least we have an inalienable right to such hope. Moreover, it is expedient, and necessary. It is one of the main motives of endeavor, and is essential to the stability of the social order, to any real progress, even to the security of civilization. Without that hope there is nothing, and if it were killed out of the heart, a time would come when the whole amount of work done by men would hardly suffice to keep them in food, clothing, and shelter.

One thing that works incessantly to defeat such hope in this country is the increase of taxation. It discounts the best endeavors of the most frugal and industrious persons. It drags business and burdens the home. It discourages the new enterprises of which progress consists, and it makes it take longer by weary years to pay off the mortgage with which the home was built. It reduces the family income, and keeps the wife drudging along in last season's dress when she needs a new one.

And the merchant feels that, too. Taxation and progress are fundamentally hostile. Mounting taxation is the worst foe to American welfare today.

It cost about $18,000,000 to administer the government of California in the two years 1907-1909. Our latest appropriation for the biennial period is $91,000,000; in fourteen years it has been multiplied by five. There has been no such gain in population. That has not even doubled. The annual tax bill of the state, for Federal, county, municipal and state government, has reached the handsome figure of $380,000,000; more than $1,040,000 a day. It exceeds the aggregate value of all the field crops, fruits, and vegetables of the state, as estimated by the Federal Bureau of Markets and Crop Estimates: that only came to $363,000,000 a year ago.

We have to deal, to some extent, with the sleepless mobocratic desire to plunder property. This is assisted at times by a fallacious belief that it enhances prosperity to "make money circulate"; as though anything could keep it from circulating. And we have the incessant efforts of bureau attaches to extend bureaucracy and multiply tax-consuming positions. Such things are hard to control. But in addition there is a downward tendency on the part of the people themselves to engage, in the name of "progress," in more and more governmental activities, represented as progressive by over-busy and officious improvers, appealing to sentiment and unreflecting altruism. This manifests itself in the addition of item after item to the general burden of taxation and public debt, each item apparently worthy, each costing but little, but the whole amounting to a back-breaking aggregate.

At present it will do little good to scold at the excessive burdens put upon us by the war. They were unavoidable, their causes deep in history and social evolution, and we can hardly hope for much relief except through slow and painful liquidation. But there is one field nearer home in which we have manifested an irrational tendency to add to the burden, and where we might begin to retrench; where the load has been, with our careless consent, piled upon us one item at a time in a manner almost imperceptible; and that is the field of public education.

In San Francisco alone the increase in the tax rate for schools has outrun the increase in population four or five to one; and it is largely caused by a load of socialistic functions of little value to sound education. This merely reflects the general course in the state system, which in its turn has been affected by the example the State University has set in the confusion of the elective method, in some of the incidents of co-education, in reducing matriculation standards, admitting high school graduates without examination, relaxing restraints and impairing discipline, letting down academic aims to the level of popular and ignorant demands, providing feather-bed courses for the indolent, giving credits for dancing and swimming and lowering the dignity of scholarship to such a level that it excites no particular comment when a class in criminology can be instructed by an ex-burglar and boot-legger.

In San Francisco, the schools cost the taxpayers, for the year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $5,574,045 (without bond redemption), of which the state supplied $844,318, leaving a net cost to the city of $4,729,727. For next year the supervisors have set aside in the budget $4,799,144, or over $78,000 more, with but a slight increase of population, and in spite of the fact that the state will supply an additional $1,345,932. The rate for this one purpose mounts much faster than the population to take care of it, and it mounts faster because it is not merely fundamental schooling that is being supplied nowadays, but a lot of extraneous and entirely dispensable activities, many of them under the departments of physical education and domestic economy.

Physical education has run wild. It now has its own bureau in the state department of education, and a corps of expensive teachers who have acquired a vested interest in their jobs, and would fight like wildcats to keep them. Nevertheless it was not so long ago that schools got along with some simple calisthenics to air the lungs and relieve the tedium of the classroom; calisthenics that the grade teacher could lead, without gymnasium apparatus. It was enough. But it was not expensive, and hence not "constructive," and some zealots induced a complacent legislature to prescribe a time for physical education. That got the camel's head inside the tent, and the next session saw bills introduced "systematizing" the work—that is, providing for the employees. And now we have them. In San Francisco alone the instructors cost us some $21,000 a year, and a stenographer $1200. Before we had them they cost nothing, and we did very well, and that is what they ought to cost now.

There is the department of "home economics"; presumably something about cooking and washing dishes—all about how to make a pound of butter vanish on a hot stove. If any girl wants to learn to make biscuits like mother used to make the best instructor, one would suppose, would be mother herself, but perhaps she is too busy going to the movies, so father has to shoulder this additional burden in the tax bills. It costs in San Francisco more than $50,000 a year for "home economics," and the end is not yet.

Then there are the kindergartens, product of German socialism and American female sentimentality and indolence. They do a work in the schools that mothers ought to be doing at home, and from all accounts we get they do not do it very well. They are socialistic municipal nurseries where the children are entertained and amused until amusement gets to be an expected thing, mental excitement is a habit, and discipline is nowhere. Grade teachers often complain that they have to undo a great deal of this kindergarten work before the child is ready to receive solid instruction in the subjects schools are for. Kindergartens are a German device for promoting dependence on government. In America they have no proper place, and while San Francisco has probably not gone to seed in this direction as badly as other cities, it is time to call a halt on this sort of progress. The system should not be extended. The budget item for kindergarten teachers this year is $7000, plus part of an item of $125,000 designated as an "allowance for elementary, high, kindergarten, part time, and other teachers, to be assigned"—$125,000, just like that, so that the kindergartens are in part a blind item. Then there are courses in dressmaking and millinery, and courses in lip-reading for the deaf, and for the correction of defective speech, and courses in merchandising, and music, and navigation—probably all very well, severally, but a heavy load in the aggregate; and these subjects could all be learned under private instruction without burdening the already overburdened taxpayers. It is difficult to go into more detail in this matter because the report of the superintendent of schools for this year has not been published, and the general municipal report has not been published for six years. And, after all, these are but small items of the general waste. And all government is wasteful, we may be sure of that. What we can do is to resist sentimental endeavors to load it with more activities and with socialistic experiments, which, no matter how they result, are never cut out of the general political system, once they get in.

Government should stop with the necessary. It is all the governed can afford. And retrenchment should cut back to the necessary. Resistance will take the form of the argument that retrenchment would throw a good many people out of employment—but the same thing could be said of a general cure for disease: it would be greatly against the financial interests of the doctors, druggists, nurses and undertakers.

Germany is worse off in one way than the China she once despised. When she wishes to declare a moratorium she has to ask the Allies and get the consent of the French, who can't see anything in it, but in China the minister of finance just closes the doors of the treasury and walks off, after announcing that those doors will remain closed until funds can be found with which to do business. The Chinese method is much more comfortable for all concerned, debtor and creditors alike; the debtor doesn't worry, and the creditors get just as much. But then, China has not reached her ruin by way of an expensive war of aggression against her neighbors, and is entitled to some comforts. Meantime they are preparing for the wedding of the heir to the imperial throne, who is kept standing by for the emergency that may be caused by the failure of the pieces of the republic.

Some 10,000 persons signed a petition asking Mr. Davies to become a candidate. He failed to get that number of votes. Petition-signing is a well-known branch of American humor.—New York Times.

THE CENTENARY OF PASTEUR

"Le Matin" Initiates Movement to Make the Celebration National at Paris Instead of Local at Strasbourg.

The government has decided to commemorate at Strasbourg the centenary of Pasteur, born the 27th of December, 1822. It is a noble and beautiful thought. At Strasbourg was outlined the destiny of the greatest scientist the nineteenth century knew. It was there that Pasteur taught chemistry from 1848 to 1854; there, with an annual salary of but 1200 francs, he developed in a laboratory always lacking in equipment the discoveries which have immortalized him. It was there also that he married "Mademoiselle Marie," daughter of the rector Laurent, whose hand he asked for in these terms: "My father is a tanner at Arbois, a small town of Jura. My sisters are with my father, engaged in the cares of home and business, and taking the place of my mother, whom we had the misfortune to lose in the month of May last. . . . As to the future, all I can say is that, unless a complete change should take place in my tastes, I shall consecrate myself to chemical research."

At a time when French instruction was introduced in the University of Alsace, it was well that Pasteur brought to it the lesson of that simplicity which German pride has never known. This was illustrated when on the 18th of January, 1871, he returned his diploma to the University of Bonn. The dean, Dr. Maurice Naumann, in reply, took occasion to express his great contempt for Pasteur. The generations that have succeeded these two men can now contrast at Strasbourg the brilliant achievements of Pasteur with the contempt of Naumann.

But it is not enough that Alsace honor Pasteur. His glory is that of all France. How can Paris remain impassive on the day that Strasbourg celebrates the memory of this great man? Can it be possible that the Academies, the Parliament, the Sorbonne, the schools, the Pasteur Institute itself, shall be represented at the centenary by only a few delegates in the parade? No! The centenary of Pasteur should be a magnificent review of all the benefits with which he has filled the world, with all the recognition that is his due. For this immense review it is necessary to have the setting of Paris.

Le Matin will alone assume, if necessary, the initiative, being certain of conveying the sentiments of the capital and country. But we are convinced that we shall have as willing assistants all men, all organizations, and all executives who realize the inconsistency of giving a local character to a celebration which should be the celebration of French genius and of universal gratitude.

All professions, all provinces, all classes will come with veneration to welcome the echo of that great voice which said in the hour of his success:

"All of you, whatever may be your career, do not permit yourselves to be overcome by disparaging and sterile skepticism; do not allow yourselves to be discouraged by the trials of certain sad periods that pass over a nation. Say to yourselves first: 'What have I done with my education?' Then, as you proceed: 'What have I done for my country?' And, when your efforts have been more or less favored by success in life, you should, as you approach the end, be able to say sincerely: 'I have done all that I could have done.'"

There is advice worthy to remember! In Pasteur there has come to us a man who has consecrated all his life to others, who wished no other joy than that of accomplishing a benefit for mankind, who by devoting every hour, every impulse of his genius, to the service of humanity accomplished, to use the words of Brouardel, "The most formidable of revolutions that in thirty centuries have aided medical science."

This great man among the great suffered more than once from the misunderstanding of men. As he was approaching his end he was heard to remark, upon reference being made to the many and constant attacks launched by those who attempted to deny or destroy the results of his work: "I did not know that I had so many enemies."

France today, after so much spilling of her blood in the world's cause, sees the results of her victory disputed just as Pasteur had heard the triumphs of his genius denied him; she also has reason to declare sadly: "I did not know I had so many enemies." May she, following the example of Pasteur and in commemoration of his centenary, have the courage to await the day of justice, and to apply herself daily without discouragement or anger in the spirit which animated the whole life of Pasteur, who often repeated: "We must work."

The appeal which Le Matin addressed to its readers, asking them to cooperate with it and the entire country in making a worthy celebration of the centenary of Pasteur, has had an echo in the municipal council. MM. Marcel Héraud and Deslandres have submitted a proposal under the terms of which the office of the assembly has been invited to study a project for a fitting celebration of the centenary of the illustrious savant. At Strasbourg the Journal of Alsace and Lorraine writes, with regard to the general celebration of the centenary of Pasteur:

"That is a praiseworthy initiative. Pasteur, the great scientist, will be honored by a celebration in Paris, the heart of France, and at the same time in Strasbourg, heart of Alsace and advanced sentinel of latinity. What apotheosis could be more worthy to the memory of the great Pasteur!"

Le Matin has received the following letter:

"The permanent committee of celebrations of the beneficent works of chemists wishes to be among the first, if not the first, to respond to the appeal which Le Matin has addressed to its readers in favor of a Pasteur centenary celebration. You know the activity of this committee, its loyalty, its devotion. To serve—notably all the great interests of the country—is its motto. The generous initiative of Le Matin responds to its conception of something worthy to be done. We extend you our coöperation."

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

A STATE ON TRIAL. (Washington Star.)

More than a fortnight has elapsed since the crime at Herrin, Illinois. There is no indication whatever of a prosecution of the perpetrators of that hideous outrage. If the state authorities are working they are covering their activities with a smoke screen, and as far as the public is informed nothing is doing. The only pronouncement thus far made on the subject is that of the coroner's jury, which laid the blame upon the company owning the mines and specifically upon the dead superintendent. Yet the country expects a prosecution, at least a show of law enforcement. It may be that the county in which the crime occurred will not yield a jury competent to pass upon the guilt of those who may be accused. If so there are other counties where fair trial might be held. The governor of the state himself has just been acquitted of charges of malfeasance in office in a changed venue.

The State of Illinois is virtually on trial at the bar of public opinion in this matter, and unless it acts sincerely and vigorously it will be condemned as incompetent. Such crimes are not strictly state affairs. They affect the welfare of the whole country. If mobs can form and massacre peaceful workers in Illinois they will be encouraged to permit similar crimes in other states. Public security is menaced everywhere by such violations of law. As the case now stands the partisan claims of labor leaders and their civic official sympathizers serve as full acquittals on the ground of self-defense, and every day that passes without stern action in the name of justice helps to establish those acquittals as the final verdict. If that verdict stands unchanged an indelible blot will have been put upon American honor.

LYNCHING AND EXTRADITION.

(Brooklyn Eagle.)

Georgia had a governor in Hugh Dorsey who had the courage and the common sense to demand equal legal protection for blacks and whites and to antagonize lynching. To her disgrace Georgia retired Dorsey and took a man who was apologist for the lynchers. She stands, then, as a state where the majority sentiment supports mob murders.

If Georgia pays the penalty of this in the refusal of the governor of Ohio to extradite a negro accused of murder in the Cracker State, she has only herself to blame. It may be true, it probably is true, that in the election of next November Governor Davis is anxious to hold for the Republican party the sympathy and allegiance of the negro voters of Ohio. But leaving that out of the question, his course is understandable, as plainly justifiable as that of the Canadian courts who recently refused under similar conditions to send a negro back to North Carolina.

RAILWAY WAGES.

(New York Tribune.)

In discussion of side issues bearing on the railway strike let no one forget the main fact.

What is it? It is whether or not railway wages, compared with the cost of living and the general purchasing power of the dollar, are up or down from conditions that existed in the pre-war era? Are the machinists and other repair and maintenance men relatively better off than they were, or are they worse off? It is possible that railway employees were getting too little in 1917, but some datum line must be adopted as presumptively fair.

According to figures of the Railroad Labor Board, the average hourly compensation of railway machinists in 1917 was 50.5 cents, against 70.3 cents under the new scale. During the same period the cost of living has had a net increase of 17 per cent. So the machinist gets in purchasing power 19 per cent. more than in 1917.

Figured in the same way, the striking car men have declined 45.7 per cent. more in actual wages, and the common labor increase is 45 per cent. So down the long list of classifications. As to every class the railway employees have made a large net gain. This, under economic law, has been at the expense of non-railway workers.

Figures make dull reading. But when accurately compiled they often tell a story not otherwise communicable. The evidence is that the period since 1917 has been one which railway employees may remember gratefully. They have prospered and are now prospering more than the rest of us.

THE GROWTH OF MEDDLING.

(New York Times.)

A court decision now holds that the powers of the state movie censors extend to news reels as well as to those which are more or less hastily regarded as art, and that news photographs which seem indecent or improper to the censors may be excluded. Thus the censorship of the news begins, and it is hard to say where it will end.

The immediate danger, of course, is not great. Few people learn of what has happened from the movie news reels; and it would be rash to say that pictures could be shown in public of everything which may be described in the news. But the wedge usually enters by the thin end. In this particular case, the picture found obscene by our censors represented nothing but some girls in one-piece bathing suits, a spectacle which can be seen at Long Beach any Sunday, and which the average observer does not find in any way exciting. But nobody is qualified for a job as censor unless he is able to see evil where the ordinary mind would never notice it.

The powers of the movie censors stop with the movies. But it has been held that they may forbid the showing of photographs of things that have happened. Apparently, there is nothing in the decision or the regulations of the commission that might prevent partisan censors from applying their powers to the elimination of news that had a political aspect. And when the next offensive comes for the extension of a moral censorship to printed works this precedent may prove inconvenient. If books are censored, why not magazines? At least one of the books suppressed in recent years on motion of the Vice Society had run through magazine serialization with no objections, so far as the public knows. If it was wicked, it was just as wicked in the magazine. And if magazines, why not newspapers?

There is some logic in these arguments, and they lead straight to the conclusion that the public should be permitted to read and see only what three political appointees think will be good for it. Our censors in this state are not so bad as most, but persons of tolerance and judgment can rarely be persuaded to become censors, and are still more rarely invited.

OLD FAVORITES.

Avice.

Though the voice of modern schools
Has demurred,
By the dreamy Asian creed
'T is averred,
That the souls of men, released
From their bodies when deceased,
Sometimes enter in a beast, —
Or a bird.

I have watched you long, Avice,— Watched you so,
I have found your secret out;
And I know
That the restless ribboned things,
Where your slope of shoulder springs,
Are but undeveloped wings
That will grow.

When you enter in a room,
It is stirred
With the wayward, flashing flight
Of a bird;
And you speak—and bring with you
Leaf and sun-ray, bud and blue,
And the wind-breath and the dew,
At a word.

When you called to me my name,
Then again
When I heard your single cry
In the lane,
All the sound was as the "sweet"
Which the birds to birds repeat
In their thank-song to the heat
After rain.

When you sang the Schwalbenlied,
'T was absurd,—
But it seemed no human note
That I heard;
For your strain had all the trills,
All the little shakes and stills,
Of the over-song that rills
From a bird.

You have just their eager, quick
"Airs de tête,"
All their flush and fever-heat
When elate;
Every bird-like nod and beck,
And a bird's own curve of neck
When she gives a little peck
To her mate.

In that furred,
Puffed, and feathered Polish dress,
I was spurred
Just to catch you, O my sweet,
By the bodice trim and neat,—
Just to feel your heart beat,
Like a bird.

Yet, alas! Love's light you deign
But to wear
As the dew upon your plumes,
And you care
Not a whit for rush or hush;
But the leaves, the lyric gush,
And the wing-power, and the rush
Of the air.

So I dare not woo you, Sweet,
For a day,
Lest I lose you in a flash,
As I may;
Did I tell you tender things,
You would shake your sudden wings;—
You would start from him who sings,
And away. —Austin Dobson.

The Northern Lights.

To claim the Arctic came the sun
With banners of the burning zone.
Unrolled upon their airy spars,
They froze beneath the light of stars:
And there they float, those streamers old,
Those Northern Lights, forever cold!
—Benjamin Franklin Taylor.

Morning Song.

Up! quit thy bower! late wages the hour,
Long have the rooks caved round the tower;
O'er flower and tree loud hums the bee,
And the wild kid sports merrily.
The sun is bright, the sky is clear;
Wake, lady, wake! and hasten here.

Up, maiden fair! and bind thy hair,
And rouse thee in the breezy air!
The lulling stream that soothed thy dream
Is dancing in the sunny beam.
Waste not these hours, so fresh, so gay:
Leave thy soft couch and haste away!

Up! Time will tell the morning bell
Its service-sound has chimed well:
The aged crone keeps house alone,
The reapers to the fields are gone.
Lose not these hours, so cool, so gay,
Lo! while thou sleepest they haste away!
—Joanna Baillie

The Bank of England was established in the city of London in 1694. Although a private institution, it is under government control, and constitutes the treasury of the empire, England having no national treasury like that of the United States. It is managed by a governor, deputy governor, and twenty-four directors.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

William McFee, the novelist, is an engineer on one of the United Fruit Company's steamers, plying between New York and ports of the West Indies.

Andrew C. Lawson, whose recent article on the prediction of earthquakes has attracted wide attention, is a celebrated field geologist, and has been professor of mineralogy and geology at the University of California since 1890. From 1914 to 1918 he was dean of the college of mining at the same institution. He is a past president of the Seismological Society of America, and the author of many papers and monographs on geology.

One of the popular members of the Washington diplomatic corps, although without regular standing, is Señor Don Manuel C. Tellez, secretary to the Mexican Embassy. Señor Tellez has been at Washington for several years and has made a host of friends. For a large part of the time of his residence he has been in charge of Mexican matters, owing to the absence of an ambassador because of the non-recognition policy of the United States.

William J. O'Toole of Gary, West Virginia, who has just been appointed minister to Paraguay, is the youngest man in the diplomatic service holding that rank, and being just twenty-eight years of age, he is among the youngest who have been named for such high responsibility by the Secretary of State. Mr. O'Toole is well known in Washington, where he passed five years at the Catholic University, receiving his degree of A. M. in 1915. He is the son of General Edward O'Toole, an official of the United States Steel Corporation, and since his return from military duty has lived in Gary and held a position under his father. On the outbreak of the war, young O'Toole trained at Fort Benjamin Harrison, and after receiving his commission he was at once transferred to Camp Grant, where he remained throughout the hostilities, acting as instructor.

George Horace Lorimer, editor of the Saturday Evening Post, and one of the most widely known of American journalists, is fond of Northern California, and especially of the Eel River country, where his summer vacations are habitually spent. He believes the great redwood forests are the most beautiful wilderness in the world, and worth more to the people in their natural state than sawed into lumber. He declares that if we destroy the wildernesses where people can enjoy a little taste of pioneering life such as our ancestors had, we shall change the national character, and not for the better. Lorimer is a Kentuckian, born at Louisville, and is the son of a clergyman. He became editor-in-chief of the Saturday Evening Post in 1899, and is the author of "Letters from a Self-Made Merchant to His Son," "Old Gorgon Graham," "The False Gods," and "Jack Spurlock—Prodigal."

George Wharton Pepper, junior senator from Pennsylvania, is probably that "Philadelphia lawyer" whose astuteness is so often requisitioned in debate for the solution of mysterious problems of the law. He has practiced in Philadelphia continuously for thirty-two years, and is the author of many legal text-books. He is a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, where he was once Algernon Sidney Biddle professor of law. He is an Episcopalian, and has represented the diocese of Pennsylvania for many years in the general convention of that communion. What is not so generally known of him is that he was once hammer thrower of prowess, keeps himself in superb physical condition, and was supposed to be the hardest muscled man in the Senate until Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin demonstrated superior toughness. Pepper never slights an opportunity for exercise, plays tennis on the White House courts with his son-in-law almost every morning before the other senators are out of bed, and several afternoons a week he plays baseball with the Senate pages in front of the Capitol. He was appointed to the Senate by the governor of Pennsylvania to succeed the late Boies Penrose.

Lord Milner, K. G., formerly British secretary of state for war, who has just become president at the age of seventy of the Rio Tinto Copper Company of Spain, was governor-general of South Africa at the time of the outbreak of the Boer war. After that struggle, and the organization of the Union of South Africa, he received a pressing invitation from the late J. Pierpont Morgan to join the Morgan firm and take charge of the London end of the business, but he preferred political service to a commercial career and so declined. His experience in political service has been broad. He began life as a journalist, and became private secretary to Mr. Goschen, chancellor of the exchequer, in 1887. From 1889 to 1892 he was under secretary for finance in Egypt, and then became chairman of the board of inland revenue, governor of the Cape of Good Hope, governor of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony, high commissioner for South Africa, member of the war cabinet without portfolio in 1916 and secretary of state for war in 1918. In 1919 he became secretary of state for the colonies. He was created first Viscount Milner in 1902. His book, "England in Egypt," has long been regarded as authoritative on that complicated subject. He remained a bachelor until his sixty-ninth year, when he married the beautiful and gifted widow of Lord Edward Cecil, who, in her childhood, sat for Sir John Millais' painting known as "Puss in Boots."

BAMBOOZLEMENT.

Rare, Book by a Medium, Reprinted, Shows How the Miracle Makers Make Them.

The proper reviewer for this book, "The Revelations of a Spirit Medium," would be Joseph Rinn, name anathema to the spiritual mediums of the country and many of the spiritualists of the world, including Sir Oliver Lodge, who disdained to submit to his tests. For Rinn, New York merchant and amateur exposé of humbug, not only knows all their tricks, but can do all their tricks, including Eusapia Paladini's, which he detected and exposed. As to the value and timeliness of the volume in this pathetic period of the world there can be no question. Rough, defectively composed, atrociously printed from zinc-type plates apparently, it has those internal consistencies that are the earmarks of truth.

This is a book with a mystery and a history. When first issued in cheap form from some press in St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1891, it was extensively bought up by mediums and destroyed. So it became rare. This reprint is prefaced, introduced, and supplied with notes and a bibliography of the subject extending over twenty-eight pages, by Harry Price, F. R. N. S., librarian of the Magicians' Club, London, member of the Society for Psychical Research, and of the Society of American Magicians, and Eric J. Dingwall, M. A., member of the Society for Psychical Research and of the Inner Magic Circle, London. As for the authorship of the text, that is by A. Medium—which one is not divulged; nor discovered, though much speculation has been devoted to it. And while it exposes the methods and tricks of thirty years ago, we may be sure humanity is just as credulous today, and that some at least of those tricks will never grow old. Just as credulous? It is more so. And Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Sir William Crooks have lent their names and the inseparable authority of science to the support of a belief that has little other foundation than the desire of hearts wrung by sorrow, and driven to seek comfort from quacks. Perhaps they get it, at times. We doubt if such comfort does much good, or is to be preferred in the long run to the moral gain of standing up to the common lot of grief, and suffering it with fortitude until it gets to be an old story and subsides. But undoubtedly in the general woe that has followed the deaths of millions in the war, many others left to carry their burdens alone have become an easy prey to the peddlers of delusions and enervating beliefs.

Well, let us get on with our sheep: the book itself. It is one of the most entertaining that has possessed us for some time. Its faulty grammar and obsolete slang as well as the vile reproduction of its uncorrected letterpress mark it for genuine. These are undoubtedly real confessions; the experiences of a successful fraud at one of the greatest of modern impostures. And a broad principle of human feeling and conduct (what some persons just have to call "psychology") is revealed in the manner by which the author, from the viewpoint of a sincere believer in spiritualism and mediums, becomes himself a medium. He was urged by friends to develop his "mediumistic powers," as Sir Oliver Lodge would put it. To do this he was to sit in a "cabinet" made of hangings across a corner of a room, with his believing friends as audience, until something occurred to indicate that the spooks had taken notice. He says of himself at this time:

Thus encouraged, he continued the "sittings" until the sixth month had passed into the months that are gone. Nothing had occurred, except a healthy desire on the part of both "medium" and sitters that the "manifestations" be forthcoming, betting in the "medium" an inclination to cause some phenomena on his own hook. The more he thought about it the stronger became the desire to practice a little deception on his friends, then, after telling them of it, drop the matter entirely. After turning it over in his mind for some time, he concluded he would see what effect a few spurious "manifestations" would have on his friends. It would be easy, they having unbounded confidence in him. His mind made up to do it, he hardly knew what to try, and finally concluded he would wait until the "sitting" came around and, after getting into the "cabinet" see what suggested itself. This was the course he pursued, and on one Saturday evening, after the first song had been sung, the "sitters" were delighted to hear sharp raps, seemingly on the walls of the room within the "cabinet." Of course, the "medium" had to be happily surprised, or appear so, which he did, and his first act of deceit was done. He was forced to deny the authorship of the raps, also, and the first lie had been given birth.

Facilis descensus. He felt that he was in for it. There was no way to explain his little joke without wounding the sensibilities of the believing friends "out in front." So on he went:

A dozen times was he on the point of peaching on himself, but as many times did a sense of shame overcome his resolution, and he told himself he would tell them one at a time, as he met them, laugh it down and dismiss any further "sittings." The "sitters" were so delighted, and offered so many unselfish congratulations and encouragements, shaking his hand and patting him on the back, it is no wonder he felt his smallness. One of the ladies remarked:

"There! I am sure none of us need ever have any doubts regarding the 'physical manifestations' after this. I am sure Mr. ——— would be guilty of no act of deceit."

Then he became like the victim of the dreadful buckwheat cake habit described by Bill Nye—or was it Mark Twain? The first buckwheat had no perceptible bad effects, and the victim was induced to venture on another. More followed, until he became an addict. He sacrificed his fortune, his good name, the roof from over the heads of his wife and children, to satisfy his wild craving for buckwheat cakes. No tears and piteous pleas of wife and mother and little ones could call him back from the brink of ruin over which he seemed determined to plunge. So with our medium. He couldn't stop. He invented a "control" or tutelary ghost, who advised him to charge strangers for sitting in at the demonstrations. He invented more tricks. And then:

Many were the congratulations received by the "medium" over the progress made and the wonderful "manifestations" just received. The strangers paid their admission fee and expressed themselves as well pleased that so wonderful a "medium" was being developed right there in the city, and they should not have to depend upon the traveling "mediums" when they wanted communication with their friends. After his visitors had departed, the "medium" took the dollar from his pocket and wondered what he should do with it. He had made up his mind, now, to become a professional "medium," and concluded he would keep it for the purchase of articles he would require in his business. Since his "sitters" had mistaken his handkerchief for a human face, he had an idea that he could provide something that would not require so much of the imagination to make it appear a face, and to that use was put the dollar received at his first public "seance." Repeating to a toy and novelty house he purchased one of those wire gauze masks, which would permit a light to shine through it. This he trimmed down until it could be put into the breast pocket, and yet enough remained to make quite a good spirit face. By putting this mask in front of the luminous handkerchief a luminous face and head was presented. It was bald of course, until he discovered that with a small piece of black cloth he could put hair on the gentleman. That wire mask has been recognized by dozens of persons as fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, cousins, sweethearts, wives, husbands and various other relatives and friends.

It would astonish you, reader, to know what a large number of the faces are recognized as friends and relatives by the people who receive them. The writer knows of at least five people who have recognized Lydia Pinkham's newspaper cut as relatives, after it had been transferred to the "medium's" slate.

In fact, humanity believing what it wishes to believe, sees what it wishes to see, and that accounts for the wild tales we hear and the wild things at which people wonder. This book is a revelation, not merely of the tricks of mediums, but of the unreliability of human testimony. It should greatly interest lawyers, judges, and policemen.

Rinn, to whom we referred above, can convince the ordinary person that the phenomena produced by mediums can be reproduced at will by any magician who has the apparatus. But the converted spiritualist replies that mediums, at least honest mediums, do not do it that way, but by the aid of spirits. To such credulity there is hardly any effective answer, except that famous one by Lecky, who, after conceding that there is no way to prove a negative, merely observes that as people advance in culture they cease to believe in miracles. The "Revelations" however, go a step beyond Rinn. They not only show that the dishonest mediums "do it that way," namely physically and deceptively, like stage magicians, but they leave little room to believe that there are any other sort. The author developed a fine inventive faculty, until he was at the top of his sinister profession. He practiced all over the United States and made large sums of money, with the devices of fraud and chicane and with apparatus beside which the ordinary stage magician's is crude. He was part of the inner craft, and was frequently consulted by other mediums for new tricks and methods. And he testifies:

He will say, just here, that of all the "mediums" he has met, in eighteen years, and that means a great many, in all phases, he has never met one that was not sailing the very same description of craft as himself. Every one; no exception. Of course, the lecturers he has met, who do not lecture under "influence," and have no phase of "mediumship," are probably honest in what they teach. They are not different to any other convert to spiritualism who does not lecture. There may have been a few of the "inspirational speakers," too, who were honestly mistaken as to the inspiration. It is a fact that he has "developed" inspirational speakers, for a financial consideration, who have taken to the platform, and who believed themselves inspired. It is true, too, that in some cases he was not very proud of the quality of inspiration he had developed. He was proud of no part of it, save the financial consideration which reposed in his wallet.

There is a full exposure of the cabinet manifestations that have befuddled so many persons—that sort in which the medium is tied in a chair, and banjos are played, bells rung, horns blown, and a guitar is waved through the air above the curtains with a tune proceeding from it—played, not by a returned spirit, but by a small Swiss music box inside, costing about a dollar. Some of the adventures with persons determined on exposing the tricks are amusing. One reporter insisted that the medium go into the cabinet with a mouthful of wine and hold it. The medium had to think fast that time, but he got hold of the bell, inverted it between his knees, and it held the wine while he blew the horn, when he was able to take the wine into his mouth again, come out with it, and convince them all that he had had nothing to do with the horn physically. In performing this trick Rinn goes into the cabinet with a mouthful of coffee and comes out with a mouthful of milk.

Dissolve one-half ounce of camphor in two ounces of aquavite; add one ounce of quicksilver and one ounce of liquid styrax, which is the product of the myrrh, and which prevents the camphor igniting. Shake and mix well together. Bathe the inside of the hand and the fingers in this preparation, allowing it to dry in and you can duplicate the performance with the lamp chimney and hold your fingers in the blaze quite a while without any bad effect. You will also be able to accomplish it without any grimaces or gibberish or rolling of the eyes.

For the remainder of the performance, dissolve all the salt

a tea-cup of water will contain. In another cup dissolve a tablespoonful of soda in warm water. Now pour the two together, and after they are well mixed wash the little boy's hair, or that portion you intend using in your experiment as a sun worshipper, combing it until dry. Now take the necktie of a gentleman friend, and your confederate, and after washing it allow it to dry. You are now ready to accomplish the feat in its entirety, the only thing needful being to roll your eyes, throw back your head, and make sounds that would shame a Siwash Indian with your voice. You could go the lady one better by adding to the first preparation two ounces of pulverized red stone. After stirring it well together rub the bottoms of your feet with it and you can walk several steps on a bar of red hot iron.

The tricks of slate writing for his time are explained by the author, and he gives full consideration to the belief on the part of the victims that they have held fast to the slates so that the medium could not have inserted or substituted anything, or written on them himself or had a confederate do so. But he says:

No man ever received "independent slate writing" between slates fastened together that he did not allow out of his hands a few seconds. Scores of persons will tell you that they have received writing under those conditions through the "mediumship" of the writer; but the writer will tell you how he fooled them and how you can do so if you see fit.

Another feat that drove people almost wild was performed in the following way:

Performer shows slates clean and washes them to insure against having been prepared. He now binds them tightly together and coming down into the audience has some gentleman hold them above his head, in full view of the audience. He then produces a book of poems and allows one of the audience to open it at random by pushing his pencil or knife blade between the leaves. The book is opened and the performer reads the first two verses of the poem on each page, after requesting the spirits to write what he reads between the slates. After the reading is finished the slates are opened and the verses just read are found copied between the slates. "There!" you will say; "your silicate flap or acid writing will not work in this case, for the writing is done after the book is opened and read, which is done after the slates are fastened together."

The writing was done through the flap method, just the same. How did he know where the book would be opened? He did not care where it was opened, as the book was specially made for him and every page was exactly alike with the exception of the number. Not very wonderful, is it?

The educational value of the movies has been illustrated again of late by some pictures showing a girl who can not be lifted by the strongest man against her will. Some such person is always cropping up to amaze the wondering. Here is the explanation, a very ordinary, natural one, applied to the case of Lulu Hurst, the Georgia Wonder:

The trick of lifting her from the floor is that upon which they put special value as indicating the operation of the force, but, as in all the other tricks, there is a mechanical advantage taken by the lady which renders it impossible to lift her. The trick lies entirely in the position of the body. The elbows are thrown slightly out and back, the shoulder blades are slightly drawn together, the spine elongated to its full extent and the body slightly inclined forward. In this position no man on earth can lift her or any other lady or person who will practice the trick until the proper position is learned. The trick of holding her after the chair on which she stands has been drawn from under her is likewise dependent entirely upon the position of her arms. Her elbows are thrown either forward or backward sufficient to permit of her easily dropping to the floor. Those attempting to hold her up are thrown out of balance and all power of lifting is lost. She will not submit to a straight, fair, vertical lift, but invariably drops out of the vertical line. In lifting her from the floor she will not permit any but one certain hold. If the lifter could put his arms around her, grasping her left wrist with the right hand and her right wrist with the left hand, then she could be easily lifted, for her power of squirming would be killed. All the element of flesh contact may in this case be preserved, but she will not permit it. So, too, in holding her up, if the lifter could have one hand under her arm at the shoulder joint, any two boys in the land could lift her up.

Do mediums work together? Apparently many do, to the extent of large collections of information about credulous individuals and their dead, gleaned from cemeteries and small town gossip. Family albums yield portraits, and are used by "spirit photographers," another branch of the craft, to make spirit photographs of dead persons hovering about the living. Having gained access to a believer's home, and induced him by some pretext to leave the room, the medium opens the album:

It is your duty to yourself and brother "mediums" to be at all times armed with the 25-cent cameras. These cameras are made of paper or pasteboard. In order to obtain a copy of a photograph, pull the two ends as far apart as they will go, which is the proper focus for an object one foot distant. Now place the photo to be copied in position and tear the small square of black paper from the aperture, retaining the end that hung loose. Count fifteen, and stick the piece of black paper over the aperture—it was already mucliged, all you have to do was lick it—press the end together, put it in your pocket, and you have a fair copy of the picture.

Should fraudulent consolations be peddled about? It is hard to think if you believe in the truth. On this head the author says:

The writer has furnished positive proof of life everlasting to scores of skeptical minds that the church did not reach. It was very satisfactory proof to them, but the writer knew just how much it was worth, and for his own satisfaction it did not fill the bill.

It is very pleasant to believe that you do not stop in the grave, if you can; but a large majority of people do not want to believe it any longer—they want to know it.

Perhaps the next best thing to knowing whether you will stop in the grave or not would be not to care whether you did or not, but that is an Oriental attitude, and few Occidental souls can feel that way. Meantime, there is little real danger of disturbing anybody's belief in spirits, once they have it. The psychologists who present this book have remarked: "Once converted, a spiritualist seems able to believe any nonsense."

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 15, 1922, were $148,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $126,700,000; an increase of $21,600,000.

Owners of railroad bonds, especially speculative issues, have perhaps been at somewhat of a loss to interpret the respective actions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Railroad Labor Board in announcing reductions in freight rates and certain classifications concerned, the situation, if it has changed, has changed for the better. Uncertainty in the matter of freight rates is now removed and there is no occasion for deferring traffic longer because of the expected reduction. A few suggestions follow, whereby the investor can procure a high yield without assuming undue risk among the second-grade rail bonds.

Missouri Pacific general mortgage 4s, 1975, at 64 yield about 6.40 per cent. This company was effectively reorganized five years ago, and its capitalization was adjusted to earning power. A return of 5 3/4 per cent. should cover all fixed charges one and a half times over; but the road operates in a territory capable of marked development, which means heavier traffic and larger earnings. These bonds should gradually work into a high-grade investment position.

St. Louis-San Francisco prior liens 5s, 1950, at 86, yield about 6.10 per cent. This road also operates in a territory with possibilities of greatly increased traffic. Its revenues have been practically doubled since 1914. These bonds are outstanding in three series, to a total amount of about $126,325,000. The total indebtedness of the company amounts to less than $38,000 per mile, of which the prior liens represent all but about $3000.

Southern Railway General 4s, 1856, at 67, yield 6.40 per cent. In good times and bad, this road has been able to earn its fixed charges by a fair margin, and now that better days are ahead for the cotton-growing communities, these bonds are in line for a higher investment rating. In 1914, when cotton prices were extremely low, Southern Railway earned its fixed charges about one and a half times over.

The outrageous behavior of union labor in southern Illinois, and the seditious utterances of the labor leaders at Cincinnati, have effectually alienated any decent public sympathy for the striking coal miners. The whole affair is thoroughly typical of Bolshevik Russia and abhorrent to the principle of our republic. There is reason to hope that the more aggressive attitude of the Federal government marks the beginning of the end of the strike.

The financial developments of the post fortnight include the lowering of the rediscount rate of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York from 4 1/2 to 4 per cent., the advance of some of the Liberty bonds to new high prices, and the extreme weakness in foreign exchange, especially German marks and French francs. The action of the New York bank, which will probably be followed by reductions by other Federal Reserve banks, had been long anticipated, and particularly since the recent decrease of the English bank rate. The prospect is of a continuance of easy money, which is, of course, a bullish influence on the trend of security prices.

The decline in exchange indicates the desperate financial condition of Germany and may result in forcing France to take a more reasonable attitude in regard to the indemnity and the question of floating a German loan, which economists generally insist is a necessary step toward the rehabilitation of Europe. In spite of Germany's past sins, she is still so economically important that the prosperity of her neighbors depends upon her recovery and, sooner or later, this fact must be recognized by continental politicians, as it already is in England and America.

The strike of some classes of the railway workers is not regarded as a very serious menace, either by the financial community or the roads' executives. As it stands, the strike is practically in defiance of the United States government and, under these circumstances, the outcome is hardly open to question. Consistent improvement continues to be shown in most industries throughout the country. The improved crop outlook for grain is reflected in better business for the mail-order firms and makers of farm implements.

The spectacular seventy-point rise and subsequent thirty-point reaction in Mexican Petroleum, with the squeezing of a big short interest, has influenced the trading aspect at times. There has been considerable absorption of the comparatively small supply of the stock by people cognizant of the real value of the issue and the importance of the recent oil discoveries in the company's territory. Some other speculative leaders were bid up sharply, and later the rails under the leadership of New York Central. It is among these latter stocks that there are now to be found some of the safest and most attractive speculations, particularly Baltimore & Ohio, the St. Pauls, Wheeling & Lake Eries, Rutland preferred, New York Central, Wabashes, Pittsburgh & West Virginia, Nickel Plate and Pere Marquette. The strike threat has permitted strong interests to accumulate the attractive rails.—The Trader.

An important development affecting bond prices was the recent action of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, followed soon after by the Boston bank, in reducing the official rediscount rate from 4 1/2 per cent. to 4 per cent. Such a reduction has been warranted for some time and the announcement caused no surprise, but at the same time it had a stimulating effect on the bond market. The present cur is the sixth which has been made since the high rate of 7 per cent. ruled from February 5th to May 4th, 1921. A week previous the Bank of England took similar action. It is thought that other district reserve banks will also reduce their rediscount rates soon, says Forbes Magazine.

The bond market, especially for Liberties, which possess a high collateral value, responded to the lower discount rate by going to new high levels. The credit resources of the banking system are now so great that it would require a tremendous expansion on the part of commerce before the demand would occasion permanently higher money rates and, aside from technical reactions, lower bond prices are improbable.

While there is sufficient credit to meet the requirements of the stock and bond markets and increasing trade demand, bond market activities should not be confused with business activities. It means rather the investment of capital in sound corporate instruments instead of its use in business transactions, and care in selecting investments is still a prime factor.

One of the most stable enterprises is that of furnishing public service, and in good times and bad the ratio of defaults for public utility bonds in comparison with other classifications is extremely small. The following public utility bonds are attractive for investment purposes at this time:

Northern States Power 5s, 1941, at 92, to yield about 5.70 per cent. Outstanding to the amount of $24,560,000, secured by a first lien or deposit of securities upon property valued at $72,098,000. This company has shown a healthy expansion in earning power and at this time is making marked strides in increasing net income. The company is in a sound position and paying dividends on the common stock.

Commonwealth Power First 6s, 1947, at 90, to yield about 6.85 per cent. The $12,500,000 of bonds are secured by a pledge of $27,325,900 of common and $5,382,500 preferred stocks which represent the control of five strong public utility operating companies. None of the Illinois Power First 7s, 1936, at 101, to yield about 7 per cent. The company supplies public service to the city of Springfield, Illinois. Net earnings are running at the rate of about two and a half times the annual interest requirements on the total funded debt of the com-cultural products was more than 10 per cent. Averaging the reductions which have already taken place with those which will be effective July 1st, the net for all loadings is probably not more than 5 or 6 per cent.

The wage reductions mean a saving of $100,000,000 a year, it is estimated, and with other economies and the increase in shipments which are quite sure to come in 1922, the freight reduction should be fully offset and, in time, gross revenues should reach a new high figure.

pany. There are $1,925,000 of 7 per cent. bonds and $3,075,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, the total being secured by a first mortgage on the entire property, which is conservatively valued at considerably in excess of this amount.

The California Car Company is offering $250,000 8 per cent. cumulative preferred capital stock (with bonus of common stock) at par value of $10 a share. The California Car Company is a corporation organized and exist-frequency of service equal to that given by bus lines and at a lower cost.

The cost per mile of operating a Bowen Model C car is 14 cents—about one-half the cost per mile of operating a larger size motor bus, or about one-tenth the cost per mile of operating a locomotive with a passenger coach.

Model C will speedily revolutionize the railway business in the handling of short-haul passenger traffic. It will enable their owners to operate at a profit thousands of miles of branch line and short line railways that now are being operated at a loss.

The success of Model C is assured. The experimental stage of A. D. Bowen cars became long since a thing of the past. The efficacy and stability of even experimental models A and B have been thoroughly demonstrated, and their practicability is acknowledged by the railroads and by the public alike.

Model C is incomparably superior, in every particular, to any railway carriage designed by Mr. Bowen hitherto. It embodies the consummation of all his aims.

The A. D. Bowen Model C railway motor car is the company's own product, manufactured under the company's own rights of patent.

Pinkard, Shaughnessy & Anderson, investment bankers, have recently moved their offices from 345 Montgomery Street to larger and more conveniently arranged quarters on the mezzanine floor of the California Commercial Union Building, corner Pine and Montgomery Streets.

A new issue of $200,500 Iliff Municipal Irrigation District, Logan County, Colorado, serial 6 per cent. bonds is being offered by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company, due serially from June 1, 1923, to June 1, 1931, at prices to yield 6 1/4 per cent. income tax exempt.

These are old seasoned bonds, the available portion of $209,000 unmatured outstanding bonds issued in 1911. They are a prior tax lien concurrent with other general taxes, ranking ahead of mortgages and other private liens. There are 13,256 acres of irrigated lands directly taxed for payment of these bonds. The resident population within the district is approximately 3000. The average value per acre is $93. Taxes for payment of principal and interest of bonds are levied by the county commissioners and are collected by the county treasurer at the same time and together with state, county, and school taxes.

It has frequently been said that money invested in public utilities, and therefore devoted to the public service, should be satisfied with a lower return than money invested in other enterprises, says Floyd W. Parsons in a recent article in World's Work.

Such an assumption is absolutely unwarranted, for one person who has money to invest is always just like another. Practically every one who has money strives to invest it where it will bring the largest return with the greatest degree of safety.

If any one is offered an investment in a public utility that pays 5 per cent., and just as good an investment in something else that pays 8 to 10 per cent., it is an absolute certainty that the investment netting the largest return will get the money.

Let no one overlook the truth that money is a commodity which we buy and sell just as we buy and sell grain or clothes or lumber.

A public utility or a municipality can not buy money for less than other people pay for it, any more than this same utility or municipality can buy coal or labor for less than it is worth in the market.

Every utility, no matter where it is located, requires new capital for continuous additions to its plant, and it can not get this necessary capital unless the corporation is permitted to earn and pay a fair return on the new money.

Mr. Cyrus Peirce of Cyrus Peirce & Co., investment bankers, has just returned from several weeks' travel in European countries. During his trip he visited the most important financial and business centres in Switzerland, Germany, France, Czechoslovakia and Austria. Mr. Peirce says:

"Germany is working, and working hard from morning until night. All of the basic industries are busy, though some of the manufacturers of specialties are working part time."

"The two outstanding features that particularly impress travelers are, first, the enormous amount of electric power line construction that is noticeable everywhere. High-tension lines are covering the country. Every bit of falling water is being utilized. In addition to that, the thousands of acres of lignite, or what is commonly known in Germany as "brown coal," are being stripped by steam shovels and mined the same way for compression into briquets to be burned under central power stations. In other words, Germany is straining every nerve to make herself independent of the Saar Valley in case she should lose it."

"The second noticeable fact is the tremendous amount of new building construction that you see everywhere. Factories are building large additions and old workmen's houses are being replaced by new and modern structures. This, of course, appears to be an evidence of great prosperity, but in digging into the reason for this one finds that it comes from an entirely different cause. Nothing is allowed to be shipped out of Germany except under a permit issued by the government. The reason for this is twofold: first, because Germany wants to keep the retail prices in Germany very low, because of the depreciated mark, and second, because the government wants, as far as possible, to control the exchange situation. Therefore, practically no permits are issued to manufacturers unless they are willing to allow the Reichsbank to handle the exchange. The Reichsbank gives to the manufacturer from the proceeds of his bills or drafts enough gold to replace his raw materials and pays the difference in marks. ...s and minds of her own people. Until they can change their point of view and get some backbone, Vienna will continue to be on object of charity.

"Prague, the capital of Czechoslovakia, is a busy city, but looks as if it needed a thorough housecleaning. The principal industry of Czechoslovakia just as present is politics. The country itself looks prosperous. Agri culturally, its principle products seem to be wheat and hops with some fruit. In western Czechoslovakia, or what was part of the old Bohemia, the industries appear to be reasonably busy.

"Switzerland industrially is having a rather hard time. There has been no depreciation in Swiss exchange, and for that reason no particular inducement for people to buy, and since Switzerland's principal output, high-grade watches, is distinctly a luxury, the Swiss have had pretty hard sledding. On the other hand, there has been a terrific American invasion of Europe this year, and when it begins to get hot in Paris the line of tourists will begin to converge on Switzerland and the influx of American dollars will be a great help to their situation.

"I feel somewhat competent to speak of the attitude of France and the French, because I have been through France, through industrial France, through agricultural France—yes, even to the base of the Pyrenees. The French of France, and in this I make a distinction between them and the Parisians of Paris, love America; of this there can be no question of doubt. France is not an industrial country primarily. She is an agricultural country; and as far as I can see, every acre of ground of France is being put to the highest state of cultivation from sunrise until dark. Every man, woman, and child is busy. They are working and saving, just as they have worked and saved for a hundred years, demonstrating the racial characteristics that have been France's salvation more than once.

"I went there with a preconceived idea that France was loafing and whining for indemnities. She is doing neither. She is working sixteen hours a day and demanding only that that which is properly due her shall be properly paid. She is waiting for payment, but she is hustling while she waits.

"France has issued many billion dollars of bonds which she has sold to her own people, and is using the proceeds in the shape of loans to the inhabitants of the devastated districts for the purpose of rebuilding. France expects those bonds to be paid out of German reparations, and in that she is asking no more than is justly due her."

There is a scientific unwritten law to the effect that of two theories, the simpler and more plausible should be accepted to explain any given phenomenon. Axiomatic though this rule is, one can not help wondering if the anti-evolutionists have ever heard of it. Or if they have, what in the world their simpler-than-evolution theory is. Certainly, any that have deviously wandered into publication—and how deviously no one can realize till he has perused the roundabout irrelevancies of an anti-evolution argument—do not seem simpler to our mind than the A B C's of Darwinism. A year or two ago a serious argument on Darwinism would have seemed ludicrous to most of us. Religion itself has long since graciously reconciled the allegory of the Bible with the facts that fossils and stones tell. Then why the newly resuscitated debate on a subject whose principles were published in the much-maligned Victorian era and which even our old fogey grandparents were familiar with? It is perplexing, to say the least. But meanwhile—that is, before the hub-bub again dies down and the normalcy of evolutionary doctrine is restored—it is amusing to read the propaganda of what might be called the revolutionists.

One of the latest contributions to the debate is "The Fortnightly Club" (E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5), a book that we at first supposed fondly to be a symposium of opinions on this subject. It was rather G. Lowes Dickinsonesque in style, and the cover misleadingly told us the argument was cast in the form of debates. Nothing of the sort. Mr. Hutchinson, the author, and an English popular philosopher, has given us one-half of the debate—the anti-evolution. True, there are members of the Fortnightly, notably Sir James Macadam, the Scotch geologist, who is arbitrarily represented as a humorless fossil himself, who believe in the Darwinian principle, but Launceston, the man who holds that animals do not think and are a sort of automata marvelously endowed with life, is the star member of the club, and the book is little more than a monograph of his contentions, chief among which is the astounding one on animals, noted above. And the main form of argument of Professor Launceston is the reductio ad absurdum which is so fatally easy to use and misuse. For example, he answers the argument that man has evolved from the lower animals owing to the accident of a flexible lower jaw capable of evolving speech, with the dramatic introduction of a parrot. The fallacy is simple, and if one may answer one absurd argument with another, it lies in the fact that the parrot is in a different stage of evolution. Given a few million years and psittacus sapiens may be the master of the earth.

Admittedly, this is absurd; but no more so than answering the time-worn axiom that speech and evolution have gone hand in hand, with the introduction of a live, blaspheming parrot. But this delightful series of *reductio ad absurdum*s must not be taken too seriously. In the first place, in the introductory chapter, the writer admits that in his position of secretary to the mythical club, his pencil may have slipped—he wrote in shorthand—and that his interpretation may be at fault. As for Launceston's experiments with his dog, either it was an extremely stupid dog—and some are duller than others—or he grossly misinterpreted it. We incline to the latter view. At least if we were setting out to make a comparison of canine and human intelligence we would not be so unscientific as to limit ourselves to one canine example. Since he was out for the argument of wit rather than of fact, Mr. Hutchinson should have chosen a really stupid animal for his comparative study, the hummingbird, for example, which W. H. Hudson says is, in its curious crystallization of an earlier form of life, most nearly like an automaton of all vertebrates. Incidentally, since he has no opportunity to study more than one dog and his knowledge of animals is obviously limited, we recommend to Launceston the Hudson book that we have just read, "The Naturalist in La Plata" (E. P. Dutton & Co.; $3), which is warranted to convince the most skeptical that the lower animals have depths of brain and character which he who opens his eyes may read.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Eugene Manlove Rhodes, whose latest novel, "Copper Streak Trail," is one of the most vivid of recent outdoor stories, was educated at the University of the Pacific, in San Jose, California. He has been a cowboy in the Southwest, and thoroughly knows the land of which he writes.

Emerson Hough has been interested in a surprising confirmation of the actual occurrence of an episode which he incorporated in his new novel, "The Covered Wagon" (Appleton). In the novel a meeting between Kit Carson and Jim Bridger takes place at Laramie. Mr. Hough knew of no such actual meeting, but knew the country, dates and habits of the men enough to know they might have met there. Now he has received word that in an exhibition at the Sacramento "Days of '49" celebration a rifle has been on exhibition with a card stating that it had belonged to Jim Bridger and that he brought it with him over the Oregon trail to Bidwell's Bar, after having met Kit Carson at Laramie. And the novelist sees in the fact a curious and gratifying confirmation of an interesting scene in his novel.

The Louisville (Kentucky) Herald has this to say in appreciation of Ann Cobb's "Kin-folks," published by the Houghton Mifflin Company: "Never have we seen more perfect interpretation. The vision of a true poet might account for the artistic perfection of this volume, bound in its kiver pattern, but only love, true and understanding, could be responsible for the feeling, the perfect tact and tenderness—not since Kipling's dedication to 'Mine Own People' have we seen this equaled."

The Macmillan Company announces a two-volume "History of the Arabs in the Sudan, and Some Account of the People Who Preceded Them and of the Tribes Inhabiting Darfur." It is by H. A. MacMichael.

Edgar A. Mowrer, author of "Immortal Italy," just published by the Appletons, has lived for a number of years in Rome. He has been Italian correspondent for one of the largest papers in the United States and has been in close touch with all phases of the Italian situation. During the war he served as correspondent on the Italian front. Recently he has been at Genoa observing the work of the conference there. It is interesting that Edgar Mowrer, doing newspaper work in Italy, and writing this important and exceedingly informative volume upon the modern Italian nation, is a brother of Paul Scott Mowrer, newspaper correspondent in Paris, war correspondent on the western front, and well-known writer of such books as "Hours of France" and "Balkanized Europe."

The Houghton Mifflin Company has published a special limited edition of "Admirals of the Caribbean," by Francis R. Hart, in which Mr. Hart gives a vivid picture of the vanished buccaneers of the Spanish Main. Mr. Hart has spent much of his life in engineering and business in the West Indies, and is thoroughly acquainted with that part of the world. This edition will be of particular interest to book-lovers, both because of its beautiful format, and because of Mr. Hart's own literary associations as president of the Club of Odd Volumes in Boston.

Although the fifty-ninth issue of the Statesman's Year Book (for 1922) is published earlier than has been possible during the past few years, and though much remains to be done before the many problems resulting from the great war are definitely settled, nevertheless it contains the latest available information, either in the text or in the "Additions and Corrections." To the countries for which recent census returns were published in the last issue of the Year Book the following were added in the present issue, viz., the United Kingdom, India, the Union of South Africa, Canada, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, the Federal States of the United States, Bulgaria, Chile, Czechoslovakia, France and several of the French colonies and protectorates (Algiers, Tunis, Morocco, West Africa), Greece, the Netherlands and the Dutch East Indies, Nicaragua, Norway, Sweden, Venezuela and Russia. The section relating to the last-named country, and that dealing with China, have been specially revised. Egypt is still retained in Part One (British Empire) only because when the announcement of its new status was made it was too late to transfer it to Part Three, where it now properly belongs. Conditions in Ireland have not yet reached the stage that would justify allotting to the Irish Free State a special section among the Dominions. But an account of the situation as it is at present will be found in the Introduction Section, which also furnishes information on the organization of the League of Nations, the Imperial and Washington Conferences, and a number of surveys of world production (gold and silver, iron, steel, wool, cotton, sugar, etc.).

Important among the books to appear a little later this season will be Roy Devereux' "Poland Reborn," which E. P. Dutton & Co. will publish. Poland holds a key position in the troubled and uncertain Europe of today, and this book, it is promised, will shed much light upon the many problems and difficulties with which the Polish people are struggling.

William Lindsey is back at Osterville on Cape Cod, after having completed his fifty-fourth Atlantic passage. His last book, "The Backsliders," seems destined to follow its writer's example in his propensity for travel, as Australia has just ordered a second edition from the publisher, the Houghton Mifflin Company. The latter prophesies that it won't be long before the book catches up with Mr. Lindsey's own record.

"A New Deluge Story," by Albert T. Clay, has just been announced by the Yale University Press. The book possesses much human interest, not only because of its bearing upon the Old Testament, but because it completely overthrows the prevailing view that

There are two important competitions running at present. The American publishing house of Harper is offering a $2000 prize for a first novel, in addition to the usual terms of royalty to be arranged with the author. Aspiring first novelists should communicate for particulars to Harper & Brothers, New York City. The other competition is being arranged by an English firm, Messrs. A. M. Philpot, of 69 Great Russell Street, W. C. I. They offer £250 advance royalties for a book of self-revelation which can take the form of a diary, a journal, or a novel. "This offer," say the publishers, "is not made with a view to inviting sensational or morbid details. It is inspired by the desire for the fearless expression of truth to life, which should produce not only an interesting story of happenings, but a faithful revelation of the effects, good and bad, upon the development of the character subjected to them." December 15, 1922, is the last day for sending in manuscripts.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Pieces of Hate.

The primary objection we have to Mr. Heywood Broun's "Pieces of Hate" appears clearly in the title and abounds throughout the several essays to which that facetious label is applied. We do hate puns—any sort of pun, even Shakespeare's. Otherwise, Mr. Broun's series of catchy papers is highly entertaining, and though facetious—as one might expect from the title—often pardonably so. One of the chief pleasures to be derived from reading this singularly misnamed book is in the variety of topics Mr. Broun is able to cope with, though with less venom than one is led to anticipate. Aside from the title's being a bad pun, it is a misnomer. The implication is that one is going to read one piece of adverse criticism after another; and one settles down with a joyful premonition that at last his feelings are to be expressed adequately on, for instance, G. K. C. We are not dodging the responsibility of naming the facetious British paradoxer. That is simply the way Mr. Broun heads his chapter on him. But so far from finding a final analysis on Chesterton, we are treated to a halting review, funnily halting, of course, but not a final analysis. The only conclusion our animostic author comes to is that of experiencing a slight disappointment in Chesterton. "He's not as fat as we had heard." This is all very well if one is out for nonsense. But we repeat it is not adverse criticism.

Two Mystery Stories

Two of the most important recent detective stories are "Two Dead Men," by Jens Anker, and "The Eight Strokes of the Clock," by Maurice Le Blanc, creator of the famous Arsène Lupin, of whom the present volume relates the latest exploits. It is interesting to note that both of these works are translations. Jens Anker is one of the most popular of young Danish writers, his forte being the detective-mystery story, which he handles with superb technique and the dryness of a police record. His style, in fact, could not be more opposed to M. Le Blanc's rather florid melodrama.

"Two Dead Men" is supposedly the story of one of the super-crooks of Danish criminal history. A super-criminologist, pitted against our hero-villain, supplies all the action and mystery unraveling necessary to a first-class detective story. The book is translated from the Danish by Frithjof Toksvig.

"The Eight Strokes of the Clock," M. Le Blanc's latest contribution to the exploits of his favorite hero, Arsène Lupin, now appearing in the guise of the Prince Rénine, is a blood-curdling tale of French intrigue. It is translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, translator of the Fabre books and of many of Maurice Maeterlinck's.

Ervine's New Play.

St. John G. Ervine's new play, "The Ship," is not equal either to "Jane Clegg" or "John Ferguson," but the Irish playwright's admirable art prevents him from retrograding to a really weak performance. "The Ship" is very much of the present in story and atmosphere. In situation and dialogue it is simple, natural, and fairly strong, but it lacks that sense of inevitability which is so marked a characteristic of the other two plays. One rather suspects that the author didn't write the play because it was in him and had to come out, but because it was time to write another one.

"The Ship" reminds us of Arnold Bennett's "Milestones" because a strong-willed shipbuilder likes to mould his family to his purposes. But Mr. Ervine has devised his own plot, which includes in it the destruction of a ship supposed to be unsinkable, by collision with an iceberg.

At one blow the shipbuilder's pride in his work and affection for his son are cruelly wounded, for his son has gone down with the ship. A certain faltering in Mr. Ervine's usually firm touch is perceptible to a discerning judgment at this point. The collapse of the strong man, his suicidal intention, although not necessarily among the improbabilities, seem stage-managed, and in reading the play the emotions respond rather languidly.

Nevertheless one can but enjoy, in the first act, the dramatist's placing of his characters, and the dialogue in which they express themselves. It is not until the second act that the drive of a rather tame inspiration is perceptible.

There are, however, two excellent rôles in the play, one of a strong-souled grandmother of eighty, another of a strong-willed father of sixty, that are going to yield an opportunity for good acting. They rather shove the leading lady off the stage, as there is no important rôle for a really young woman.

From the Arkansas Gazette.

Blessed with the prayers of a good mother, and the example of a father always sober and earnest, Fred W. Allsopp plunged into Arkansas journalism. Not all his experiences were thrilling ones, but such as they were, he is willing to share them with a weary world—to furnish, as he puts it, food for reflection. So we have in this blue volume, entitled "Little Adventures in Newspaperdom," authentic fumes from the tripod of the Pythoness, and some of them are very pungent. Allsopp worked on the Arkansas Gazette of Little Rock, which he has served for more than thirty-six years; and he tells it well; also with discretion. "Where I have felt that I could not afford to tell the truth on myself, I have endeavored to be reminiscent about the other fellow." That is a good way to do it, but in Arkansas it takes judgment; which Allsopp evidently had, for he has lived to tell the tale. There is humor in the book, and there are real people in it, and sane views of humanity from the newspaper angle, or angles. And there are scattered through it here and there such bits of wisdom as the statement that "a religious controversy is the most disastrous thing that a newspaper can engage in." Students will find interesting matter here, and some of it is practical and valuable. There is more than the value of a college course in journalism in this description of Guy Bilheimer, who "wrote heads for the Associated Press dispatches with one hand, local items with the other, and talked over the 'phone to correspondents all at one and the same time. 'Gee whiz,' said he about 11 o'clock, 'if a fire should break out now how would I cover it? And there's that meeting at the Presbyterian church, a wedding, a burglary, and the Lord knows what else to write up. My, but aint I in it? But they can't down me. Unless hell breaks loose I'll get the paper out all right.'" That is journalism.

Memories of a Poet's Son.

More pretentious, issued by a more famous publishing house, but less vital in interest, is a volume of "Random Memories," by Ernest Wadsworth Longfellow, son of the poet. He mentions once again the fact that it is hard to be the son of an illustrious father; but very few persons have ever emphasized the hardship of being the father of an illustrious son. We should like to hear from Shakespeare's father, but never shall. It seems that fathers of great men never amount to much.

These reminiscences are delicately tinted little bits of the stained glass of life, some very diverting, and some quite important if you think they are. The book is good entertainment, and the author has a sense of humor, of a sort. He tells this story of his famous father: "There was a man at Newport who, after being introduced to my father, said in the most impressive manner: 'Oh! Mr. Longfellow, I have long wished to meet you, as I am one of the few people who appreciate your Evangeline.'" And this one: "My father was once walking down to Harvard Square when he was stopped by an Irishman. 'And is this Mr. Longfellow?' he inquired. 'And are you the poet?' Being assured that he was, he proceeded to say, 'I am happy to meet you, sorr. I have a brother in the port who is also a poet, and a drunkard.'"

The author studied painting in the atelier of Ernest Hébert, famous for his painting in the Luxembourg, "Malaria"; and one of the Home Cooking.

Joseph Conrad, the noted author, wrote the introduction to his wife's cook-book, which is being published in the Delineator. He says:

"Of all the books produced since the most remote ages by human talents and industry those only which treat of cooking are, from a moral point of view, above suspicion. The intention of every other piece of prose may be discussed, and even mistrusted; but the purpose of a cookery book is unmistakable. Its object can conceivably be no other than to increase the happiness of mankind.

"A great authority upon North American Indians accounted for the sombre and excessive ferocity characteristic of these savages by the theory that as a race they suffered cruelly from indigestion. The noble red man was a mighty hunter, but his wives had not mastered the art of conscientious cookery. And the consequences were deplorable. The Seven Nations around the Great Lakes and the Horsetribes of the plains were but one vast prey of raging dyspepsia. The noble red men were great warriors, great orators, great masters of outdoor pursuits; but the domestic life of their wigwams was clouded by the morose irritability which follows the consumption of ill-cooked food. The gluttony of their indigestible feasts was a direct incentive to counsels of unreasonable violence. Victims of gloomy imaginings, they lived in abject submission to the wiles of a multitude of fraudulent medicine-men—quacks—who haunted their existence with vain promises and false nostrums from the cradle to the grave."

Greenwich, London, is said to have "drifted" half a mile towards the equator in eighteen years.

THE OLD LEGITIMATE.

The Players' Club in New York has settled down to the custom of annually putting on one of the famous old English comedies in an effort to resurrect and perpetuate an appreciation of classic comedy by the present generation of theatre-goers. This year they selected "The Rivals," and produced it in accordance with the best traditions of the time, deeming it worthy the prestige of souvenir programmes got up in antique style.

It always seems natural and appropriate that English-speaking audiences should rally, at periodic intervals, in support of the legitimate masterpieces of the English-speaking stage. Also, we have become habituated to the idea of Teutonic appreciation of Shakespearean drama, and the serene Teutonic adoption of the English bard as one of their own literary progeny.

We do not, however, look to French appreciation of Shakespearean drama. In his day Mounet-Sully, the French tragedian, did frequently appear in Shakespearean tragedies rendered into French. But that tragedian, although he was not regarded as a genius, has had no real success on the French stage.

Times have changed, apparently, with the apparently unchangeable French, since the coming and going of the war. The immovable French mold in which French theatrical art was encased has cracked, since so many foreigners have taken their theatrical wares to Paris. The artistic Russians, who seem to be all over the living globe since Russia became inhospitable to all save the Bolsheviks, and who almost dominate the theatrical landscape in Berlin, are also seen in considerable numbers in Paris.

One of them, the well-known actor Georges Pitoeff, has been playing a repertoire of notable masterpieces from the Russian, English, and Irish drama (Dunsany); and what is particularly interesting to faithful lovers of Shakespeare is that he has played, with encouraging appreciation from his audience, "Hamlet," "Macbeth," and "Measure for Measure." The latter piece is so rarely played that it is probable that even frivolous and Shakespeare-surfeited Americans condescended to turn out to see it.

But what really ought, perhaps, to make us in America blush is that for more than a year Pitoeff has been playing with success pieces of this type; in an entirely unfashionable location, it may be added.

Besides this rather surprising record—for Paris, anyway—the Odéon is being packed nightly by highly appreciative audiences who are going to see "Midsummer Night's Dream"—played in French, of course. No doubt it was selected because of its comedy scenes, which are rendered with so much skill that the French audiences laugh with an abandon that our Shakespeare-sophisticated audiences rarely attain. It may be added that the management have spent their money on the human rather than the scenic quality, and that, without scenic splendor to allure in a play so eminently adapted to spectacle, they contrive to draw full houses nightly.

MARIONETTES.

The showing of Tony Sarg marionettes here in San Francisco last season was a modern revival of an old pleasure. Marionettes, it is true, have long held a place in the esteem of Europeans; Italians in particular, I believe; but the Americans, with their serene indifference to tradition, seemed to have totally outgrown them. Even the children had turned down "Punch and Judy."

Then something started the wave of marionette plays on this side, and finally an American—or, more probably, an Americanized foreigner—invented a new and modern marionette; one which, instead of being suspended from above by many strings, is worked from below, on a specially constructed stage.

The new puppet, with its simple mechanism, can be made to move as freely as the old, and can enter or exit from openings in the walls. Dondo is the man who invented and patented it; Professor Dondo, in the romance language department of Columbia University.

The man, however, who started the American craze—and who, therefore, was instrumental in turning Professor Dondo's mind puppet-ward—came from sunny Italy, constant haven of the marionettes. His name is Bufano, and he has for quite a time had his own marionette theatre in New York. He also, like Professor Dondo, has been dissatisfied with the old-style marionette, and is constantly experimenting, in a studio he has for that purpose, in evolving a puppet that, if not as large as life, is at least more than half as natural. Later came the Helen Haiman Josephs marionettes and the Tony Sarg puppets. The Kreymborg puppets, which were shown doing their stunts in a tour through American universities made by Alfred Kreymborg, author of "Plays for Poet Mimes," were, it seems, the Bufano puppets.

One of these plays, by the way, we have repeatedly seen here in San Francisco, played by human actors. It is called "Lima Beans," and was played at the short-lived Garret and Garden Theatre out at the Mission several years ago, and later at our local Players Theatre on Bush Street.

The curious feature in this new marionette cult is that schools are taking them up, and in an Eastern school the work of constructing puppets is introduced in the manual training department.

Not only are marionette theatres of real, quality popping up in little and big cities—meaning more particularly in the East and Middle West—but Anna Dondo, wife of the inventor of the Dondo marionette, has started in the city of New York a Marionette Theatre Exchange. The exchange is a place for the discussion and evolution of even newer and more progressive ideas in respect to marionetting. Also people will there market their ideas, and find a booking agency for marionette theatres in working operation. For the exchange is supplied with various marionette theatres ready for action, dramatic students being available to do the spoken rôles.

Ideas, fads, cults travel quickly. In a short time we shall hear of some marionette theatre here that can be hired for use in church parlors and ladies' clubs. If some enterprising individual had been brisk and captured the Pacific Coast market no doubt he could have set up his theatre in the ballroom or dining-room of various of the big caravansaries during the summer season, as is done at the East.

Perhaps, for that matter, it is being done, as there was a child puppet show ran for a week or two not long ago at the Savoy Theatre, home of experiments.

The whole thing is rather puzzling, for there are plenty of human players out of a job these times, so why should marionettes be in demand? Perhaps because they are cheaper. They have even organized a Marionette Players' Club at Columbia University, the members of which write and produce original puppet plays; the first move in that direction in a university. The explanation lies, no doubt, in Professor Dondo's membership in the faculty of the university. Evidently he is an enthusiast in whom they have faith.

In the meanwhile we had better look up George Sand's "The Show Man," and in that old but rather enthralling romance get a view of the traveling marionettist as he and his show appeared to his patrons in older times.

AN OPINION OF J. M. BARRIE'S.

Mr. Barrie recently gave a very long but fetching address at a dinner given in London by the Critics' Circle, in which he made a number of quite interesting allusions. For what he said was not of a portentous nature, nor said in a portentous style. In fact he was lightly, humorously casual in his address of passing comment. He has a nice sense for the right word, and I know that he would object to my use of the word "fetching," applied to his address. "Cute" was in my mind, but that's scarcely journalese. He rather impales us critics—or alleged critics—on the point of his pen, or rather cuts us with a good-naturedly sarcastic tongue, for applying to him by turns the words fantastic, elusive, and whimsical. But what would you? That quality in him that we try to describe is indescribable, so we try to express it in such poor words as will approximately do so. But Barrie can never be expressed even in a phrase or a sentence.

Sir James says several things about the latest playwrights which indicate what we instinctively felt was sure to be the case, namely, for one thing, his approval of A. A. Milne. Clemence Dane, author of "A Bill for Divorcement," also has a good word from him. And then, I must confess, he surprises me.

The other day some one who had not read it asked me my opinion of Pinero's "Iris" as an acting play; whether, in fact, it was worthy of revival. To which I replied that the play was characterized by the usual impeccable Pinero technique, that he had given it the smart worldly atmosphere which theatre-goers enjoy, and that "Iris," the girl in "The Easiest Way," was a striking presentation of the lovely woman who goes wrong because of a fatal weakness about renouncing luxury for love. "But," said I, sapiently I thought, "the sentimental American public does not like such a dynamic ending as Pinero devised for 'Iris.' It is certainly entirely probable for a rich, rather gross-minded, strong-willed, and high-tempered man to drive his mistress out into the night when she has deceived him, and then relieve his mind by smashing the fine furniture that has become useless. But will the public like that for a final impression?" The American public, I mean, that is so sentimentally chivalrous toward heroines, and that likes things to be all neatly and kindly and prettily wound up.

Well, nobody ever knows. The play created a sensation in its day, and was widely commented on. Then it passed on to the shelf. I should have thought that James M. Barrie would have flinched at that finale. But, surprisingly enough—it shows that he is a Victorian, and clings to early impressions—he mentions, en passant, in the address alluded to, that he considers Pinero's "Iris" to be the best play written in his time. "My reason," he added, "for considering it the best is that it is one I have thought most about since; not perhaps a bad test."

So perhaps, after all, it mightn't be a bad idea to try it again on the thin-skinned American public, and see how it can bear up under a strong impression.

BERNHARDT.

White-haired, one-legged, seventy-seven years of age, the indomitable Bernhardt is considering an American tour. "Good heavens!" says some one, "why doesn't the poor old girl give up, and retire in peace?" Principally, I suppose, because she wants the money. But it is not difficult to realize that a person who has always been such a driving worker as Mme. Bernhardt is not willing to give up as long as there is still a public that wants her. It is, of course, her name and past fame that she can still conjure with. And there is always a young public that will run to see a famous name that has ceased to be merely a name and become an entity.

But also there is the eternal urge to work in the energetic temperament. We saw it instanced during the war, when many old men were thrilled to the heart—some of them retired army and navy men—to have the opportunity of proving their usefulness once more. Bernhardt, no doubt, believes that she will be proving her artistic value to the public if she comes and has a successful tour (a tour, by the way, that would not extend beyond the East).

But I question very much if the flame in the artist-soul survives to the age of seventy-seven. The technique is there, the trained voice of an artist of the stage has wonderful longevity, but the imagination, the magnetism of youth that reaches well into maturity, probably will have passed away. Bernhardt is still a personality, but on the stage it will be hard to imagine her as much more than a shell of the vital, compelling, magnetic actress whom we saw in her prime.

Foresight in Calaveras

When Spring Valley in 1875 acquired the properties in Alameda and Santa Clara Counties that now constitute the Calaveras unit of San Francisco's water supply, many questioned the wisdom of the purchase.

Today we must look to Calaveras for the additional water that the city now urgently needs.

Work now under way at Calaveras will add 24 million gallons daily to San Francisco's supply, and complete development of the water resources of Calaveras will more than double the resources of the whole Spring Valley system.

This Company's remarkable foresight in 1875 made the present solution of our water problem comparatively simple.

The 24 million gallons of additional water will be brought into service through a new Spring Valley aqueduct and through the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit.

The city and the company are co-operating in this Calaveras water project in conformity with certain requirements laid down by the Railroad Commission.

Spring Valley is a privately owned system, but its operations are regulated by the Railroad Commission, and one striking result of this regulation is that today Spring Valley is in virtual partnership with the city to augment the water supply.

Nowhere else in the United States does such a cooperative working relationship exist between a privately owned water company and a municipality.

Made in varied designs to meet all conditions more and more the era of organization, which can, if sufficiently equipped with brains, sometimes knock out the dominance of capital, pure and undefiled.

A group of Harvard, Yale, and Princeton graduates, who are authors, dramatists, and actors, have become pioneers in the motion-picture field by forming a cooperative motion-picture producing company known as the Film Guild, modeled after the Theatre Guild, which is animated by the altruistic principles that capital knows not.

And here's still another organization of young men who have united in a theatrical association, under the able generalship of George C. Tyler. It consists of newspaper men and playwrights who, having noted the spectacular success of the Russian "Chauve-Souris," feel that it supplies some indication of what the American public wants. Hence "The Forty-Niners," as they call themselves—the titled indicating their pioneering in a new field—have hired a New York theatre called the Punch and Judy and early in the winter season will open in an entertainment modeled, to some extent, on "Chauve-Souris," and characterized by the Bohemian informality which has given the Russian entertainment its vogue. It is said that talented amateurs will be offered opportunities, and it is probable that the journalistic youth of New York will scintillate considerably.

Another enterprise, got up by women of the theatrical profession, is not in the truest sense an organization. But one may result some time from this small beginning. Three women—Hilda Spong, Margaret Allen, and Anita Clarendon—have pooled their issues and opened in New York the Theatrical Women's Exchange, in order to give women of their profession an opportunity, during hard times, to earn what they could from the more fortunate members of the theatrical craft. The idea is similar to the Woman's Exchange, for they are encouraged to bring the products of their skill in cooking, sewing, fancy work, and so on.

Two features seem to appeal particularly. One, the professional readers' bureau, for blind people and shut-ins—it is rather nice to think of such unfortunates who can afford it having the pleasure and excitement of being read to by people to whom reading aloud is, presumably, an art—and the other a department where home-cooked food of quality is retailed.

The enterprise sounds rather ambitious, for they have further departments: a mending bureau, a catering department, and a bureau for relieving prosperous matrons from the care and worry entailed in giving large children's parties.

Probably, however, the affair will grow, and in time become a fixed institution. More and more is there a tendency for people of one craft to gravitate together, and in this case a number of the most prominent people in the profession, such as Mrs. Fiske, Margaret Anglin, Elsie Ferguson, William Faversham, and George Tyler, are patrons.

The Columbia Theatre.

The final week of the engagement of John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln," with Frank McGlynn, begins at the Columbia Theatre Monday night. There will be the usual matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

"Abraham Lincoln" and the performance of Mr. McGlynn in the title-role have lived up to the expectations aroused by reports from the East. Mr. Drinkwater states that he does not seek to tell all of Lincoln in this play, but to reveal certain characteristics of the man. This Drinkwater has done. He has not forgotten, moreover, that a play to be successful must be entertaining.

Frank McGlynn does much to illuminate and make clear the text of "Abraham Lincoln." He has, first, a craftsman's knowledge of acting, and adds to this intelligence and a sympathetic understanding of Lincoln and the Lincoln creed. The result is a beautifully balanced and notable portraiture.

Beginning its fourth year, "Abraham Lincoln," as to cast and production, is as fine as when it was offered for the first time in America. This is because Mr. Harris, its director, insists that the only way the masterpiece can be presented is by maintaining it at that high standard. The final performance of "Abraham Lincoln" at the Columbia will be given on Saturday night, July 29th.

Following "Abraham Lincoln" at the Columbia Theatre, on Monday, July 31st, will be seen the special production of Rida Johnson Young's comedy romance, "Little Old New York," with a cast of well-known players headed by Isabelle Lowe and Creighton Hale. The latter is the stage and motion-picture star who has been the special protégé of D. W. Griffith.

Miss Lowe will be remembered as the star of the original production of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" at the Columbia Theatre. She has appeared in a number of New York successes. In "Little Old New York" she will play the Irish lass who masquerades in knickerbockers in order to secure the legacy left her brother in the days when the metropolis was a village.

Such famous characters as John Jacob Astor, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Washington Irving, Henry Brevoort, FitzGreen Halleck and Peter Delmonico enter into the telling of the story. The comedy was staged in New York at the Plymouth Theatre and had a run to crowded houses of more than an entire year.

Besides the two stars mentioned, the cast includes Dorothy Blackburn, Walter Scott Weeks, John Miljan and a score of other players.

Their Island Tomb.

A unique and touching ceremony occurred a few weeks ago in Samoa when the body of Fanny Osborne Stevenson was buried beside her distinguished husband on the great rock of Mount Vea, which towers almost a thousand feet above the Pacific, says the Washington Star. In the few days of his Samoan life, when the beloved novelist was strong enough to tramp and climb, he made the ascent of this isolated peak, which rises from the ocean about 500 feet off the mainland, and, struck with its solemn grandeur, its remoteness from human contact, he asked that the rock might be his tomb. Mrs. Stevenson in her last testament provided for the conveyance of her remains to be placed beside her husband's, and this has recently been fulfilled.

Of the many illustrious men who have selected rock tombs in isolated spots, Stevenson's and his wife's are by far the noblest and most remote. So stormy has been the season about the Samoan Islands that for nearly eight months Mrs. Stevenson's body has lain in the local cemetery awaiting a chance to convey it across the treacherous waters and to make the ascent of Mount Vea in safety. A grand tomb is pointed out to the strangers off Saint Malo on the Breton coast, where the eminent French author, Chateaubriand, had a rock jutting into the sea hollowed for his coffin. On the anniversary of his death, July 4th, each year a cure from the village says mass on the shore directly opposite and recites the office of the dead, a ceremony which attracts the tourists all over the north of France. Sarah Bernhardt has recently purchased a spot similar to Chateaubriand's and adjacent to it and will be interred where the Breton waves will dash over her tomb ceaselessly and recite her requiem.

National legislation to encourage and regulate commercial aviation is recommended in a report of the Transportation and Communication Department Committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Copies of the report were sent to members of the Senate Committee on Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Whistler once described himself as "an artist whose work is without the pale of gross popularity and whose purse is consequently not heavy with ill-gotten gold."

A RUSSIAN GLIMPSE.

The following story is taken by the Argonaut from private European correspondence:

An English lady was the wife of a Russian, a wealthy man who lived in Moscow. They had one daughter, a girl of eighteen. They had got through the war and a couple of years of the troubles since, but last year came their turn. A party of Bolsheviks came to their house and called for the master. He had just time to tell his wife and daughter to hide, which they did. When they dared come out of hiding they found the mutilated corpse of the poor man lying in front of the hall door.

They couldn't go on hiding, apparently; anyway, a second visit from the Bolsheviks took place, and they were taken before a commissar, who asked them what they could do to earn their right to food. The girl, like all upper-class Russian girls, had been through a nursing school and said she could nurse.

"Very well, you will go to the ——— Hospital. But remember, you will nurse only Bolsheviks—no nurses for bourgeois."

"And what can you do?" turning to the mother. "Evidently nothing! You shall clean the sewers!" And this the poor elderly English lady had to do or starve. All she got for her work was just enough black bread to keep her alive. She usually had to sleep under an archway or be one of many in a cellar when it was too cold to stop out of doors at night. At last she managed to conceal herself in a cattle truck, and was for three weeks hiding and being carried about in trucks, till at last she got to the Finland frontier and escaped.

Not having any papers, she had great trouble with the English consul at Helsingfors and had to get her brother in Liverpool to move the foreign office before she could get a passport.

The girl had an even more remarkable but less unpleasant time. She proved to be so good a nurse that she was selected to go to Rival to nurse a Bolshevik general. At the hospital there a German officer, a friend of his, was a constant visitor. One day this German officer told the girl he had on his conscience many dreadful things done by him or by his orders to women during the war, and that the thought obsessed him and was driving him mad, but he thought if he could do some really kind, disinterested thing for a woman in trouble it might help him, and with that in view he asked her if she would marry him, so as a German subject he could take her out of Russia. He promised the marriage should be one in name only and that when they got to Berlin he would put her under the protection of one of the commissions of English officers there and never trouble her more. She believed him and accepted his proposals, which he fulfilled to the letter—married her, took her to Berlin, handed her over to the care of the English officers, and a few days later she got a note from him to say he had taken steps to insure that she should never be afraid he would again trouble her—and in the papers that day was the report of his having put a bullet through his head. At any rate he had done his best to make some small amends and one can almost feel sorry for him.

Dr. Edwin E. Slosson, one of the authors of "Plots and Personalities," is also the author of the amazingly popular "Creative Chemistry," of which something like a hundred thousand copies were sold. He has also written other books of a different character. He has been managing and literary editor of the Independent; he has been connected with the School of Journalism of Columbia University; and gave up all his interests to go to Science Service, Washington, D. C.

VANITY FAIR.

It looks as though the King of England had become totally discouraged. He had his trousers pressed sideways for the Ascot races, and it rained. We can imagine few sights so distressing as a king whose trousers have been pressed athwartships instead of on the fore-and-aft plan, moping around a racetrack in the rain. An English tailored suit is likely to be bad enough when it is at its best—waistcoat crooked, trousers twisted, coat with wedge-shaped shoulders sloping upward to the ears, or toward the ears, and the whole garment cut down to the dimensions of a jacket through the frenzied efforts of the bushleman to make it fit the human form divine, of whose contours and outlines he has ordinarily but the sketchiest opinion. Now, take such a suit of clothes and flatten the front elevation of the trousers by creasing them sideways, so that the inner creases are interfering like a badly shod horse, put that suit of clothes on a king uncertain of his political functions, his usefulness in the scheme of history, and even his tenure of office, and then soak that suit with rain water which is no respecter of royalty, so that the internal stresses left in the cloth by the imaginative tailor have a chance to assert themselves, and the knees push out in rounded prominences, and you have an appalling spectacle on any king on any track. It is difficult to see how, after such an appearance, majesty could keep a straight face and continue to occupy its throne. Imagine old Edward I with his pants creased sideways. They were made, if we remember rightly, of little iron rings meshed together; much the same fabric now used in kitchens to scour kettles. And Edward had no doubts about his job and his position in English society. He did not fool around racetracks much, but put in his time walloping the Welsh and scuffling with the Scotch, and he got away with it. He cared nothing for rain, or the creases in his trousers.

But George V is different. That constitution which Edward began to build, has grown and grown until it has left little for George to do except try to set English fashions, and now it looks as though, with the rain and all, he is letting down at that. For Ascot has been followed by something far worse than rain on the royal leg wear. He appeared at the Goodwood races wearing a billycock hat instead of the regulation stovepipe. Society gasped. Book-makers wailed, "Wot har we comink to?" Dukes blushed. Fat countesses swooned in their Rolls-Royce berlins, and barons yelled for their beef and beer to help them through this fresh crisis of the bloom-in' old empire. Reparations, Russian trade, and the refractory attitude of France were forgotten. The sacred English plug hat has been menaced by royalty itself. Well, San Francisco gave it up some time ago. It blazed up in fleeting splendor in our Exposition, then subsided, and now is rarely seen except on a butcher in the California Market. So the king is following the best leaders of fashion. But of what further use is he when he becomes discouraged and follows where he ought to lead?

Meanwhile another bit of royalty, on the other side of the earth, prepares for an Arabian Nights wedding. Hsuan Tung, heir to the Manchu throne of China, is to be married next October. It is supposed that making him a bridegroom will in a measure groom him for restoration, so they are going to do it up brown. There will be three brides. What an advantage, from a spectacular standpoint! When that part of New York society that has not been honored with an invitation mobs St. Thomas' or St. Bartholomew's to see one bride emerge, and when the success of the wedding is measured by the size and ferocity of the mob, what might not be accomplished with three brides to one groom? Of course, the groom does not matter so much; nobody goes to see him, so the proportion of groom to bride might just as well be reduced. All he gets from the mob is pity, and hearing some one close at hand remark: "The poor fish!" But three brides would be something of an attraction. The wedding procession, we imagine, would be rather difficult to form, but it could be done. Hsuan Tung can not in this case be placed in the exact centre, with a bride on each arm, because that would leave one unescorted, and nobody could tell what she might do to ball up the proceedings. But in this case custom has provided a way. These brides are not of equal rank. Two of them are spares. They will naturally be carried behind the Manchurian matrimonial car, in covers. The third is the bride in actual service. She is known as the East Wife. She figures rather anonymously, her name being a secret and of no further use to her. She receives, however, an appellation of honor, but it sounds curious to the Occidental ear. She is to be called the Great Girl, which somehow seems to suggest big feet, although she probably has them as tiny as the art of Chinese foot binding could make them. They say that she is older than the emperor-to-be, if he is to be, but what are a few years on one bride when a man has three? She is beautiful, has a sweet temper, which old Tsi An, her defunct mother-in-law, had not, and is educated in embroidery. That last will be exciting. We can see the emperor holding the skein while she winds from it; and running all over the palace between times to find her little hoop.

The wedding ceremonies will be invested with due Asiatic brilliance and beauty. The spares will enter the palace compound by separate gates, kowtow to their lord, and disappear. The East Wife will enter appropriately through the east gate, which will have to be torn down to admit her chair, now under construction. Inasmuch as the chair is not yet built, one wonders why in time they can't build it small enough to go through the gate as it is. That is the way an American would arrange things. It seems like bad engineering, and the waste of a perfectly good gate for nothing. But the Oriental mind is peculiar, to the Occidental mind, and never the twin shall meet. Concealed in her bridal chair by heavy red and gold curtains, the bride will be met by the emperor, who will immediately shoot an arrow at the curtains to drive away the devils. Nothing can be done in China without plenty of devils to drive away. We hope he is a good shot, but inasmuch as he has been loafing around the palace all his life, except for one wild night when old Chang Hsun dragged him out of bed at 4 in the morning and seated him for a brief period on the dragon throne, an experience which nearly scared him to death, we have our doubts about his marksmanship. If we were cast for the bride we should wish to play this scene in a tank; but we shall never be a bride—it is too late. And she must take her chances with the arrow. She will be arrayed in a gown covered with diamonds and pearls, the same that former brides of emperors have worn. There is said to be no textile fabric in it, and it is so heavy that she has to be pretty robust to walk in it. How the Germans overlooked this gown at the siege of Peking we are at a loss to understand; and now it is too late for them to go back and do it over. Altogether it looks as though next October would mark the height of the social season at Peking. No news has yet come out as to whether the emperor-to-be will crease his pantaloons athwartships or fore-and-aft.

A fragment of news coming from London is that, owing to the strenuous efforts of certain health reformers, more than 400 gallons of ice-cream are now consumed daily in the British metropolis, and there is every hope that the habit will become as fixed with the public of the "isles" as it is with the citizens of the "states," says the Washington Star. Mrs. George Harvey has been much amused by this crusade to establish the universal eating of ice-cream, and naturally she has done her bit in establishing it. All Americans who go to London for a prolonged period carry all the necessary utensils to make their own, since until quite recently frozen sweets from one end of the continent of Europe to the other meant ices with fruit or brandy flavors, but never frozen cream. Mrs. Harvey has habitually served the varieties popular in her own country, and some of them, like strawberry and raspberry cream, have created a furor in English kitchens. Likewise frozen custard, delicately flavored with French brandy, is deemed the height of culinary temptation.

Medicos of Britain are engaged in lessening the tea-drinking habit of the people as assiduously as the Anti-Saloon League on this side attacked spirituous liquids and malt refreshments. The ice-cream habit is also to help curb the British taste for stronger nourishment.

THE CANNONADE.

Recent reports that a flask had mysteriously disappeared from "Uncle Joe" Cannon's coat pocket caused H. E. McFarland of St. Louis, one of Uncle Joe's fervent admirers, to burst into verse, says a Washington dispatch to the Chicago Tribune. He wrote what he termed a "cannonade" on the incident as follows:

Who was the fiend, pray let me ask,
Who filched our Uncle Joseph's flask?
The flask he carried on his hip,
From which to take a quiet nip
Of mellow stuff we used to know
In happy days of long ago.
How could one have such little tact
Regardless of the Volstead Act?
How could one be so mean and low
To rob our dear Old Uncle Joe?
To rob the widow or a bank
Is bad enough and savors rank;
To rob the graveyard of its dead,
Or take away the orphan's bread
Are crimes we may, perhaps, condone,
If circumstances all were known.
But cursed be he who breaks the lock
Or, what is worse, will watch his chance
To rob us of our private stock.
And steal our liquor from our pants.
And spare us, pray, the crushing blow
Of doing this to Uncle Joe.

"It is a question whether the author owes you an apology," the poet wrote Mr. Cannon, "or is deserving of the thanks of Congress for what he intends as a slight tribute of respect and affection for its most beloved and honored member. It is his fervent hope that there was no material delay in getting the prescription refilled."

Mr. Cannon replied to the letter as follows: "I have your favor, with enclosure, and after reading your 'cannonade,' I am willing to let the story go uncontradicted and thank you for your tribute."

"You may have heard that many years ago I gave promise to the newspaper correspondents in Washington that when they had a good story and no one to father it they might appropriate my name without fear of contradiction. I have had a good many thrust upon me, some of them irritating, but generally the other way, and I reckon the score is in my favor."

"I have a flask—two ounces—presented by my doctor, but knowing the boys in the press gallery as well as the House, I do not bring it to the Capitol, as it would represent neither hospitality nor temptation—scarcely an emergency. That may have been the inspiration for the story. It has, however, served a friendly purpose as an inspiration for the 'cannonade,' and I am again in debt, not only to you, but to the newspaper fraternity, and I thank you."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The Duke de Stacpoole, head of a distinguished Irish family, writes in his "Irish and Other Memories": "An old story is told in connection with the national failing. 'Drink,' said a preacher, 'is the greatest curse to our country. It makes ye quarrel with yer family. It makes ye hate yer neighbors. It makes ye shoot at yer landlord. And it makes ye miss him.'"

The New Yorker and the Native Son met in the downtown lobby of a Los Angeles hotel. Naturally, the talk was of Los Angeles, her growth and obvious prosperity. "By the way," said the Native Son, "where did you say you were from?" "New York City," was the reply. "By Jove!" was the enthusiastic retort of the Native Son. "That town is the Los Angeles of the Atlantic coast."

Little Willie understood that dad knew everything, so when he came in from an automobile ride he had a question ready. "Pa," he said, spelling it out, "what is a l-i-v-e-r-y s-t-a-b-l-e?" Pa looked long at his modern offspring, trying to think of a definition he could understand. Finally he said: "A lively stable? Well, yes—ah, now you know—O well, a lively stable is a filling station for horses."

A rather unkind story of W. L. George, the English novelist-lecturer, relates his adventure in a Middle Western town during his lecture tour last winter. His audience was so small that after talking for a half-hour he decided to wind it up. He therefore said, "I fear, friends, that I am detaining you and so—" There was a protesting noise from the audience and a voice said, "No, go on awhile longer. It's still raining."

Lord Kitchener was once motoring with Colonel Sir T— when the chauffeur was incapacitated by getting an insect in his eye. "Can you drive a motor?" Kitchener demanded of Colonel Sir T—. "No," Kitchener's host replied, and was told, "Every officer should know how to drive a car." When the chauffeur recovered they continued their drive while Sir T— ruminated on the field marshal's rebuke. Finally he turned to his chief and asked him if he could drive. "No," Kitchener replied austerely.

The San Francisco man was speaking. "I do not believe in all this 'boost' business," he said. "There is too much brag about it. Especially I do not believe in running down other cities, other parts of the country. It is making claims to excellence that do not need to be made, and failure to recognize which is the country's loss, not ours. We should not do it. It is not modest and is likely to arouse jealousy. But I will say this much for San Francisco. Wherever you go from here it is worse."

A Southern lady was entertaining guests at dinner. The dinner was an immense success, both from the culinary and aesthetic viewpoint. Each course outshone the last in taste and delicacy. At last a wonderful lemon pie appeared, heaped with meringue and marvelously decorated with rows and rows of dainty scallops. The guests were lavish in their approval and finally the hostess sent for the cook, an old colored mammy, who appeared round, black, and glistening with pleasure. "How did you ever scallop that lemon pie so wonderfully, mammy?" asked one lady enthusiastically. "Lawd, honey, dat's easy," beamed mammy; "I done it wif mah false teeth."

A man called on his family physician, who was also a family friend, with the information that his son had scarlet fever. "But the worst of it," said the anxious father, "is that the young scamp confesses he got it from kissing the housemaid." "Well," said the doctor, soothingly, "young people are often very thoughtless." "But, don't you see, doctor! Now to be plain—between you and me—I've kissed that girl myself!" "Oh, by Jove! That's too bad." The doctor still used his most soothing professional tones. "And," continued the unhappy patient, "as I kiss my dear wife every morning and night, I'm afraid that she, too—" But he was interrupted by the doctor dropping his professional manner with a crash. "Good heavens!" he yelled excitedly. "Then I, too, may have it."

The bans had been published for the first time in an English rural church. After the service the prospective groom went to the vicar and asked if he could have his bans changed. "Of course," said the vicar, but with great surprise. "You are not married nor bound yet in any way. But why do you want them changed?" "Well, parson, it's just that I've been thinking it over and seems to me I'd rather have her sister." "You can please yourself," replied the vicar coldly, "but of course new bans must be published." The groom-to-be looked anxious. "Ah, parson," he stammered, "I paid 'e a half-crown for putting up those bans. Will I have to give 'e another half-crown?" "Certainly," said the vicar brusquely, and prepared to go. "Ah," sighed the rural swain, and then with sudden determination, "Ah, well, vicar, leave 'em be as it is."

A tale that smacks of the apocryphal, but which runs true to type, is told of an eminent citizen of Glasgow. At the time of the erection of a monument to Nelson in the city much thought was given as to the legend the base should bear. An American with more ability for business dictation than for the labeling of monuments suggested, "Glasgow to Nelson." "Aye, a vairy gude suggestion," said the aforementioned eminent citizen. "And as the toon o' Nelson is close at hand, micht we no juist say, 'Glasgow to Nelson, six miles,' so that it micht sarve for a monument and a milestone, too?"

Like most people who happen to be blessed with a keen sense of humor, Lady Bland-Sutton, the wife of the famous surgeon, does not mind telling a story against herself—provided it is a good one. Recently she was speaking on her favorite subject—housewifery—to an audience of girls in the East End of London. She had been trying to impress on them the need for system; and had recited several examples, mostly based on her own experience. "Now," she said to one girl, "tell me just what system means." "Well, ma'am!" replied the young woman, "I should say it means doing things the hardest way."

Why Worry?

Why worry? Other people do
Their share and quite enough for you.
The worriers are always first
To urge old Fate to do her worst;
And Fate is quite obliging, she
Is lavish with her misery.

But also lavish, in a way,
At handing out a sweet bouquet;
So, since the dame is hard to guess,
Why aim one thought at Dire Distress?
Old Grief will catch you soon or late—
No need to worry! Simply wait!

A Three-Toed Tree Toad's Ode.

A tree toad loved a she toad
That lived in a tree;
She was a 3-toed tree toad,
But a 2-toed tree toad was he.
The 2-toed tree toad tried to win
The she toad's friendly nod;
For the 2-toed tree toad loved the ground
That the 3-toed tree toad trod;
But vainly the 2-toed tree toad tried—
He couldn't please her whim;
In her tree toad bower, with her V-toe power,
The she toad vetoed him.

World-Wide Bird Protection.

Representatives of organizations in various countries met in London recently and formed an international committee for carrying forward propaganda throughout the world on the subject of the protection of wild birds.

T. Gilbert Pearson, president of the National Association of Audubon Societies, New York, heads this committee, the membership of which includes Viscount Grey of Fallodon, England; Mijneir P. G. Van Tienhoven of Holland, Monsieur Delacour of France, and other well-known bird lovers.

The committee will at once take up the subject of extending the organization through southern France and Italy, where large numbers of songbirds are annually killed for food, and where no adequate restrictive legislation now exists.

Bills pending in Parliament and in the United States Congress to prohibit the pouring of crude oil in territorial waters will be given support, and similar measures will be sought in other countries, with a view of ultimately getting international action to stop this nuisance, which is responsible for the killing of millions of birds annually, whose feathers become soaked in the oil that is poured on their feeding grounds.

Mr. Pearson, who has just returned from studying bird protective matters in France, Holland, and England, reports that the general subject of bird protection in those countries is not handled in the highly efficient manner that obtains in so many of our states. "For example," he said, "there are no game wardens employed by provincial or national governments in any of these countries. Practically the only protection wild birds have ever been afforded is on hunting estates, and here the attention of the privately employed game-keepers is devoted almost entirely to game birds that are raised for shooting purposes."

King George of England has recently sold forty horses, for economy.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

THE BATTLE OF BOILED CORN.

Among the thousands of push-cart stores on the East Side no one is quite so unpopular with his fellow-man as he who sells boiled corn, says the New York Times. First, he is a transient, appearing for only a month or so. Next, as such, he has no regular stand and is forced to crowd in where he can, usually usurping some late comer's place in the street market.

In the morning, when he opens business, the first thing he does is to build a fire in his stove. To boil water steadily and long enough to cook the corn he must have a hot fire. The stove itself, with its boiler and reserve box for green corn, is heavy enough without the addition of a coal bin, so he burns wood, strips of packing boxes, barrel staves, and other odds and ends picked up in the street. In this lie most of his troubles.

As soon as his fire gets going, smoke and hot, bright sparks, soot, and cinders pour out of the abbreviated smokestack and spread themselves over the immediate neighborhood. Sparks light on the two-wheeled lingerie establishment adjoining. Soot gets into the boxes of white goods on the next vehicle, making the stock appear like the relics from some fire sale rather than the "extra values" advertised by the proprietor.

One of these unpopular corn merchants rolled his "hoodlum wagon" into the curb near the corner of Chrystie and East Houston Streets recently, and, in spite of loud protests from the men and louder wails from the women doing business in the same block, maintained his position between a dry goods merchant and an ice-cream and lemonade wagon.

The smoke from his furnace hurt the dry goods trade and made the eyes of the woman who owned it smart, and the untroubled demeanor of the corn king completely frazzled her nerves. The fact that it was her husband whose ice-cream was melted by the heat from the stove did not help matters any. There were arguments, but the corn merchant said nothing. Business was brisk and he kept still, boiled, buttered, and salted corn, and sold lots of it.

The offended ones appealed to a policeman and all he did was to threaten to drive them all off the block if they started anything. "Cops" have enough to do without discriminating between merchants all of whose licenses are in regular order.

Thus matters went until yesterday and the problem was solved. After a morning of bickering and gesticulating the woman suddenly disappeared. It was about noon and the corn trade was lively. Suddenly the woman leaned out above the carts three stories up on a fire escape. Few noticed her as she carefully raised a huge pail to the fire escape railing. She turned it over and there was a sound resembling a boiler explosion; then much hissing of steam—and no more smoke from the corn cooker. For the time being at least it was out of business.

The seller of boiled corn looked up and saw his neighbor still on the fire escape with another pail ready. He shrugged his shoulders, smiled a sad, beaten smile, and pushed his wet, steaming stove down the street. A banana peddler took his place a few minutes later and the corn man was forgotten.

At Del Monte.

Golf as usual attracts the greatest gathering and the Del Monte and Pebble Beach courses are scenes of gay activity. After the morning and afternoon rounds the golf clubhouse and the Del Monte Lodge are gathering places for luncheons, teas, and dinners. Polo is a new summer diversion, which is coming in for more than a passing interest.

The next features which will come in for attention on the Monterey Peninsula will be the mounted field day and polo championships at Del Monte of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. This will take place next Friday, and there will be events both morning and afternoon. The next day, Saturday, Carmel is to have a big celebration for "Serra Day." There is to be a pageant-procession, and the dedication of a monument in honor of Father Serra.

Miss Mary K. Browne, former national women's tennis champion, who is also ranked as one of the leading golf players on the Pacific Coast, is spending the summer at Del Monte. She is to participate in the annual Del Monte tennis tournament, which takes place August 4th to 6th.

The big event of the year will be the California golf championships at Del Monte, September 2d to 10th. The important play on the links is always attended by many social affairs at the Hotel Del Monte and the Del Monte Lodge, as well as in the homes at Pebble Beach.

Judge and Mrs. Max C. Sloss and their young son, Frank, are spending their vacation at the hotel.

Ed F. Barrows and his two sons, Lawrence and Arthur, have been at Del Monte for the past fortnight and are daily visitors to the golf links.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas W. Cushing are making a visit to Del Monte.

Dr. and Mrs. Charles F. Ford are also among the transbay society folk at the Monterey resort.

Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Boisot, formerly of Chicago, and now of Pasadena, are at Del Monte to make a month's visit. They spend much of their time with their daughter, Mrs. Byington Ford, whose new home at Pebble Beach will soon be completed.

Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Cadwallader of Menlo

Park are at Del Monte to make an extended stay. Other society folk of San Francisco and vicinity who are at Del Monte are Mr. and Mrs. Louis de Cebrian, Mrs. Algernon Crofton, Mrs. Carson Ricks, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold C. Lackenbach, William F. Humphrey, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Fleishacker.

The history of the use of gunpowder in warfare dates from the seventh century, when it was employed by Byzantine emperors to defend Constantinople against the Saracens. However, it has greater antiquity among the Chinese, who employed it for blasting rocks and in the manufacture of fireworks long before the Christian era.

Australia has long been noted for the peculiarities of the animal life found there. Practically all the forms of mammalia which abound in other parts of the world are missing. Their places are taken by large marsupials of numerous varieties, these animals being nowhere else represented except by the opossums of America.

Dutchmen were the first foreigners to venture to the distant shores of Japan, and Dutch navigators founded rich colonies in Java and Sumatra.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Jungle.

Down in the jungle of the mind,
Under consciousness and light,
Where all lost thoughts lie entwined
Like growths in a tropic night,
There are strange and awful aims
Grasping ever at the will,
Wanting it with all the strength
Of dead things that are living still.
There are panther-eyed desires
Crouched suppressed in covert caves.
Fears like will-o-the-wisp fires
Wandering on each air that waves.
There are marshes of despair
Where imagination breeds
Bats that have the face of care,
Vultures beaked like evil deeds.
Horror and confusion cling Cloudy in the branching gloom:
All things sinister or vile
Find there ready room.

Down in the jungle of the mind
These things are, as all men know.
But among them what fair forms
Out of foulness grow!
Visions that like flowers lift
Chalice of beauty up;
Winged wonders magical
As the moon's enchanted cup.
Braveries that seize desires
By their panther-throats and curb them.
Genius voices so divine
Even death can not disturb them.
Fawns of joy so fleet of foot
No wild cruel fang can catch them.
Eagle urges of the soul
Rising where no wing can match them.
Fronds of peace that mount above
All the tangle growth and slime.
Purposes liana-strong,
Born to reach and clasp and climb.
And, amid them all, the sense
Of the aspiring force of Life,
Master of them, in the end,
And of all with them at strife!
—Cale Young Rice in Harper's Magazine.

Waste.

Dawn is like a broken honeycomb
Spilling over the waxen edges of the clouds
That drip with light.

Spire, swarming up the mauve mist,
Reach their rosy tips
Like little pointed tongues
First about a shining platter,
And every window is a brazier
That cups the living gold.

Even the squat chimneys
Rooting heaven
Catch the sun upon their snouts
And keep it balancing. . . .

Only my heart,
Like a splintered vase,
Is envious of the light
It can not hold.

—Lola Ridge in Broom.

Passage.

Come, let us watch that rock down in the tide
(So many things must go, so many things!)
Once we were young and the sea was not so wide,
Or love had wings.

Once we could round the earth without a sail.
(The magic winds are gone, the magic foam!)
Where was the harbor that we did not hail—
That was not home?

Come, we will watch the moon with thoughts, not dreams, (Whatever goes, love stays, love warm and wise!)

Winged is youth; and yet our way still seems Toward Paradise!
—Cale Young Rice in the Forum.

The Clipper Ship.

There was no veneer or show beauty of the Massachusetts clippers. They were all well and solidly built of the best oak, Southern pine and hackmatack, copper-fastened, and sheathed with Taunton yellow metal. Scamping or skimping never occurred to a clipper-ship builder, and if it had, no Yankee workman would have stayed in his yard. In finish the clipper ships surpassed anything previously attempted in marine art.
Those built at Newburyport in particular were noted for the evenness of their seams and the perfection of their joiner's work. The topsides, planed and sandpapered smooth as a mackerel, were painted a dull black that brought out their lines like a black velvet dress on a beautiful woman. The pine decks were holly-stoned cream-white. Stanchions, life-rafts, and houses shone with mahogany, rosewood, and brass. Many had sumptuous staterooms, cabins, and bathrooms for passengers that put the old-time stuffy Cunarders to shame. . . .
No detail was omitted that might increase speed, and no expense spared to make the Massachusetts clippers invulnerable to the most critical nautical eye.—Samuel Eliot Morison in "The Maritime History of Massachusetts."

Leave Nothing to Chance When You Go Away For Your Vacation

Don't "take a chance" and leave your silverware, jewelry, valuable papers, etc., in the house when you are going away for the summer. You may, on your return, find everything as you left it, but—

Isn't it a great deal better to put your valuables in a place of safety and have perfect peace of mind all the time you're away?

THE GENOA FIZZLE.

Now, laying aside all minor details, I wish I could bring home to my readers the essential fact that Genoa was another experiment in the direction taken by Mr. Wilson in the League of Nations, says Frank H. Simonds in the Review of Reviews. It was an effort to substitute a general system of international association for the older idea of alliances. Lloyd George was not thinking of any idealistic objects, as was Mr. Wilson. He was concerned with questions of trade and industry necessarily and rightly, for his own nation was suffering unbelievably as a result of existing conditions.

But what he was aiming at was to set up some sort of a Pan-European gathering to which all nations would be admitted on the basis of equality—Russia and Germany, quite as much as the old Allied countries. Russia was to be recognized, Germany welcomed, the war and the Russian Revolution relegated to the past, commercial agreements were to be made and, as a guarantee of future peace, all present were to agree to respect one another's frontiers, save as modifications were agreed upon at Genoa, mainly in favor of Russia.

Now, in fact, what happened? On the very first occasion when discussion was opening, Russia and Germany went off in a corner and signed the Treaty of Rapallo, which was exactly the antithesis of the Lloyd George idea. Even if it were merely a commercial arrangement it inevitably foreshadowed a later political rapprochement. It was, in effect and particularly in its effect upon all present, a special alliance. Thus in the first days of the Genoa session two nations by their action rejected the whole Lloyd George conception—and these two nations were precisely the countries which had been outside the Pan-European arrangement and had been asked to come to Genoa to enter that arrangement.

As a result of the Russo-German alliance you had an immediate drawing together of France, Poland, the Little Entente, Belgium, precisely those countries for whom a Russo-German alliance had immediate and deadly peril. Thus, at the very beginning, you had the Conference of Genoa divided; one group of nations had drawn together because they had long been excluded from European councils and because they desired to see the settlements made at Paris abolished. The other group was concerned with preserving the arrangements made at Paris and, with the memories of the late war still fresh, was determined to guard against a new attack on its lines.

As a consequence Lloyd George's Pan-European scheme went glimmering, just like Mr. Wilson's League of Nations, and for the same reason. The Continent of Europe, the great and the small powers of the mainland, solidly refused to accept the Anglo-Saxon notion of association of nations and returned to their own conception of alliances. Russia and Germany gave the signal. France, Belgium, Poland, the Little Entente replied in the traditional European fashion. After that had happened only minor arrangements were possible. The Pan-European conception was dead.

Let Our Light So Shine.

We have never thought well of that vague, indiscriminate, and noisy form of community advertising known as "boosting," for the plain reason that 95 per cent. of such effort represents dissipated energy and wasted money. The energy is dissipated in useless speech-making and spectacular tours, and the money is wasted in salaries for easy-going officials and employees, in glaring posters, and in an inordinate amount of travel and junketing. San Francisco and Northern California are not in pressing need of further attention and exploitation at the hands of the professional booster, but they do need a vast deal of intelligent service directed along well-considered lines and for definite purposes. There is need to increase both the rural and urban population with worth-while increments, and to devise and carry into effect, scientifically and persistently, plans for augmenting industrial opportunities and prosperity and the utilization of all those benign forces which nature has placed at our disposal. It is precisely because the thoughtfully conceived movement now under way to direct attention to the wonderful advantages of this part of California as a place in which to live comfortably and do business profitably, is controlled by men of the highest character, and the ripest business judgment and experience, that we hope and expect to see it succeed. The present effort on the part of Mr. K. R. Kingsbury and his associates to fix the attention of the world upon certain advantages of soil, climate, shipping facilities by water and rail, fine harbors, cheap power, educational opportunities, fertile land at reasonable prices, wide variety in crops, dependable markets, is in every way a sound and worthy one, an endeavor that is entitled to the moral and financial support of every good citizen. This effort has back of it the best brains, the best character, the most unselfish effort that has ever characterized any movement of this sort for the good of the public, within our recollection. The men who have taken the laboring oar in this work are rightfully called good citizens, and the amount of time and work which they are giving to this effort to help Northern and Central California is only another evidence of their devotion to community and public interests. If they receive the support to which the wisdom of their plans, the character of their organization, the breadth of their vision and the confidence which they inspire entitles them, they will be able to do what they promise to do and to proceed with the continuance of a well-directed campaign which can not fail to add thousands of highly desirable citizens to the population of Northern California and to increase very considerably the importance of this community as a financial, industrial, and shipping centre. The people of Northern and Central California are face to face with genuine opportunity. We can not think they will do otherwise than seek to make the most of it.

Hearst, Johnson, and Moore.

During the past month the prospects of better representation for California in the councils of the nation have grown bright. The campaign of Mr. Moore gives hope of rescuing the good name of the state. Not the narrowest partisanship can successfully misrepresent the importance of the public meetings that have assembled to make his acquaintance and acclaim his candidacy in the south; and in Central and Northern California one organization after another has been formed involving the most vigorous and progressive citizenship to carry the contest into new districts as soon as the candidate returns to this territory.

It is always an uphill fight to unseat a man fortified with patronage, especially one expert in building political machinery, but in this case the effort is greatly assisted by the conduct, the attitude, and the affiliations of the incumbent himself. Senator Johnson has long since ceased to represent the citizenship of California. What he really represents is William R. Hearst, and his intimate relationship to Tammany Hall.

It will interest those who have hitherto regarded Senator Johnson as a pure and sacrosanct patriot if we recall briefly one of the many ways in which this overt Hearst connection has been manifested. It was a shameful thing, but it was not done in the dark—rather brazenly, in the open, as though the public, and especially the California public, would soon forget it, or lack the intelligence to understand its import. When the civilization of western Europe was fighting for its life no tale of German virtue and success was too lurid for the Hearst press to print, and truth was a dispensable ingredient. One wild story to make people in this country believe Germany was winning the war was printed in the Chicago Examiner under the spread head "London in Flames." London was not in flames, and no such news had been cabled. Added to his other Germanophile activities, this broke the back of the British camel's patience, and Britain closed the cables to the Hearst news services and papers. The English are often rational, and perhaps Downing Street reasoned that if he could manufacture news in his news shops he did not need to burden the wires with it. Italy, France, and Canada followed Great Britain's lead. The Associated Press sued out an injunction to restrain the Hearst news service from rewriting European news sent to this country by the Associated Press, and so matter for his papers was badly curtailed. Hearst fought, lost, and appealed the case to the Supreme Court.

To a person of his political theories, what Hearst seemed to need before the Supreme Court was a United States senator, so he retained Johnson. And Johnson, while a United States senator, took a fee from William Randolph Hearst for representing him in a case before the country's highest tribunal. Fortunate it was that the founders of the republic made the Supreme Court independent of the United States Senate—unfortunate that they did not see the necessity of prohibiting the prostitution of senatorial influence involved in the appearance of a senator before that court during his term of office. In this case, however, the independence and honor of the Federal judiciary were enough. Hearst lost.

But Johnson at one time appeared to have presidential possibilities. Hearst commended him to Hylan, and he "made" a fee of $25,000 trying to put over Hylan's pet scheme on the traction companies. And Hylan lost. Hearst must know he himself can never be President; but his idea seems to be that if he can float Johnson along on a few fees and keep him on the public stage in the character of a United States senator, he may by some fluke land him in the White House. Said Lowell once:

If you git me inside the White House
Your head with 'ile I'll kinder 'n'int
By gittin' you inside the lighthouse
Down to th' eend o' Jalaam's P'int.

If Hearst can not be President it would serve his purposes if he could hand the presidency to his attorney.

Are these possibilities exaggerated? Is the picture overdrawn? The Argonaut has no disposition to go beyond the inferences warranted by the facts. The Four-Power treaty is one of the greatest achievements of American diplomacy, one of the brightest omens of peace that ever appeared above the glory of the dawn. It is difficult to speak calmly of it. Because of this treaty, even before its ratification by the other powers, the clouds of distrust that had gathered over the Pacific have been dispelled. It was the greatest piece of statecraft we have seen in our generation. Because of that treaty, mothers of California boys now know that they do not have to see them marched away to war, and scan the papers every morning through their tears, choking with the fear that they may find the beloved name among the dead. And what did Senator Johnson do to save them from that? He did what his Anglophobic client wanted. He carried Hearst and Tammany Anglophobia into the Senate chamber, he fought against the policy that even now has brought "peace on earth, good will to men," and he labored to defeat the treaty, with his voice and with his vote. He did not act as a Republican, he opposed the President instead of supporting him. He did not represent the Republicans of California that time. He does not represent California now.

Men like Chester Rowell and Marshall Stimson know that he does not. They have welcomed the opportunity to promote and to support the candidacy of Mr. Moore, a man of immaculate honor, who never touched corruption, a man to whom dishonesty would never dare speak, a constructive character and one of the real up-builders of California and the Pacific Coast, a man who fights fair and who usually wins his fights; not a mere opportunist and oppositionist, but a man of principle and achievement, and of that high hope for humanity which expressed itself in the idealism and inspirations of the Exposition of which he was the president and principle creator, and in his subsequent loyalty to every public movement that seemed to promise the end of wars; and a man whose official influence no wealthy adventurer would think of trying to buy.

Twenty-Four Years.

You remember, of course, young Lieutenant Rowan, who carried the message to Garcia during the Spanish war, and what sermons were written and recited about his heroism and persistence and devotion to duty? Well, last week Congress got around to giving him a medal, the Distinguished Service Cross, with a citation of his service. But it was not to the young lieutenant that Congress gave it. It was to Lieutenant-Colonel Andrew S. Rowan, grown old enough by this time to be a grandfather. We are glad Colonel Rowan has his cross. He is a resident of San Francisco and this city may take pride in the fact. But twenty-four years is a long time.

It should not take long to bestow a cross. The Kaiser used to hand them out on the field of battle by basketfuls. (After the battle.) But it has been a brief lifetime since Rowan's feat. Many bridges have been built and much water has run under them since then. Second-growth redwood has grown to sawlogs. In twenty-four years the world has gone a long way on its course, forward or backward, according as you view it. William McKinley was assassinated and Theodore Roosevelt rose to power. After several bad starts, and reorganization of the commission, the Panama Canal was constructed. Russia was trounced by Japan, and the attitude of the brown and yellow races toward the white was changed. Gilbert K. Chesterton gained fame and weight, and Henry James expatriated himself. Mr. Bryan ceased to run for the presidency, except occasionally. Judge Alton B. Parker used to get into the papers every day for going swimming in the Hudson before breakfast, but if he still does it not a paper in the country would give him a stickful on it. The whole art of human flight has been developed, and of wireless telegraphy; and automobiles have ceased opening in the back, and Detroit has become a great city, on the motor-car industry. Puff sleeves have gone out of fashion and short skirts have come in and are on the point of departure, and the United States have been invaded by the Baha Ulla religion, and New York has had several spasms of virtue and as many relapses into vice, and so has the rest of humanity, and the Standard Oil Company has been dissolved into many small companies about as profitable as the old one, and futurism and cubism have possessed the field some persons know as art. We have had insurgency in Congress and Mooseness in national politics, and both are nearly forgotten, and Mt. Lassen became a successful volcano, and Dempsey nearly killed Willard at Toledo, and the movies grew from the nickelodeon stage into an eight-hundred-million-a-year industry, and Hollywood grew from nothing to notoriety, and William H. Taft was elected President and then defeated, and now is Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and San Francisco burned down, and rebuilt itself, and built a great exposition and tore it down again, and we had President Wilson and the European war, and the German Empire became a name and Europe a chaos, and the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was outgrown and supplanted by the Four-Power treaty, and Hiram Johnson was elected to the Senate and wants to be again, and Harry Léon Wilson introduced flappers into American life, and a generation grew from birth to voting age and three years over, and the country went dry; and still, down to a week ago, Andrew S. Rowan did not have his cross. Twenty-four years to give a man a medal!

If the Emporium decided that some clerk or salesman in its employ ought to have a medal, that medal would be forthcoming within twenty-four days—we had almost said hours. If Hale Bros., Inc., decided that some one on its pay-roll had earned a medal by saving the store, and it would be good policy to donate it, there would be a little meeting and in his best Exposition manner Mr. R. B. Hale would make a short speech and present it. If the Southern Pacific or the Western Pacific or the Central Pacific Railroad wished to present a medal to some heroic fireman or engineer who had saved a train, or the Robert Dollar Company decided to honor in that way some skipper who had saved a ship, it would not wait twenty-four years, nor twenty-four months. It would do the deed and get it over with. That is business.

We might concede that giving medals and crosses is not very important, and not urgent at all; and yet in a human sense it is very important, and if it is important, it should not take twenty-four years to do it. We may concede that the government has had considerable to do besides seeing that Lieutenant Rowan's execution of orders was formally recognized. Yet it doesn't take long to give a man a medal, and if it is going to be done at all, it ought to be done. And it is not as though this were a singular case of governmental oversight or neglect. It is not unique; it is typical. Every so often we see in the papers a brief announcement that compensation, with interest, has just been voted to the heirs of some farmer whose cow was commandeered for beef for the American army in the war of 1812; or that a private bill has been introduced for the relief of the heirs of some contractor who had a mule shot in the Mexican war. Comparatively few such cases are reported, because the repetition would grow tiresome, but they often come up in Congress, generations after the money is due and should have been paid. It is the dilatory way of all government. Because there is no commercial responsibility there is no discipline, no training, no promptitude in the dispatch of business. Only national emergency can induce government to make one quick motion. Procrastination is part of its character, delay is an ingrained habit. If you do it today you may leave nothing to do tomorrow. If you don't do it today, the public "will not long remember," nor put in a bill. If it should remember some costly case of oversight or neglect, you can blame it on some other department, or make a speech about the grand old flag. Enough persons can always be hoodwinked to make reelection reasonably sure.

It has taken Congress twenty-four years to give a man a medal, and yet some people want the production and distribution of hydro-electric energy in California turned over to a board of five politicians, endowed by constitutional amendment with $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money to spend. It is incredible.

"Henry and Me."

The case of "Henry and Me," now before the American people through the columns of our more or less free press, bears the bright omen of promise for calm, dispassionate discussion of principles, without the vituperation which is generally present when such controverted issues are under debate; and which always clouds the main question when it is present. The fact that "Me" introduces his bosom friend Henry at a great meeting of students of the Kansas Normal School, that Henry, who has authorized "Me's" arrest for alleged violation of Henry's pet industrial court law by posting in his window placards sympathizing with the rail strikers, proceeds at the meeting to lambaste "Me" unmercifully and in the same speech concedes that he is a self-sacrificing martyr, and that immediately thereafter "Me" invites Henry home to chicken dinner—all this argues well for our native rationality. That is American.

But if the Kansas industrial court law makes it necessary to abolish the freedom of the press in time of peace, then that is not American. The sympathy of the Argonaut in the case of Henry and Me is entirely with Henry in his effort as governor of Kansas to protect "the party of the third part," namely the public, against a coal famine brought on by a strike. But the judgment of the Argonaut is altogether on the side of the "Me" in the case, who has attempted to assert a fundamental American doctrine in the face of the power of the state government. He is protecting a public right that is far more valuable to this nation than coal. And when sympathy conflicts with judgment, it is time to show sympathy the door.

Admitting at once the gravity of the situation and the calamities that would follow a much further prolongation of the coal and transportation strikes, there is something involved here that is more important: the right of a free people to a full expression of fact and opinion in time of peace. Liberty has made the railroads, and while it did not make the coal it made all the value the coal has, and about all the value there is in life itself. We have grown so used to freedom we don't know we have it, just as we never think of the atmosphere, another quite important thing. Some of us appear to have grown as oblivious of it as children who never heard of it, and to value it as little. Yet almost all we have of physical comfort and the materials of civilization has been produced and brought to us under free conditions. Under conditions of liberty and security the railroads and the mines have been developed, and the railroads at least are better than any built or operated by any government anywhere.

No socialistic trick and device for securing industrial peace is worth as much as the free play of individual effort and the free expression of individual opinion, to a people whose whole history shows them capable of using freedom well. The party of the third part, namely the public, which is in danger of suffering from the coal famine and the transportation tie-up, is in more serious danger of the loss of its liberties from the efforts of popularity-hunting politicians to cure every temporary ailment by legalistic artifice. Under that influence our constitutions are becoming a patchwork of debating-society resolutions instead of guarantees of fundamental rights. The public is in greater need of having freedom of action and of utterance protected than the contents of its coal bins. The want of coal may become a terrible want. But to say that men must mine it, and not strike against the conditions under which they are mining it, is too near oppression. Henry says that is not what the Kansas industrial court provides—that it only provides that other men shall not order strikes. But there is little practical difference.

You may deny liberty to Hindus, and they may be better off for it than they would be free, but the people of this country are not Hindus. And when we attempt to get rid of our pressing troubles by means of a law under which an American editor can be jailed for displaying a placard sympathizing with strikers, much as the Argonaut may condemn such a vile frame of mind, it must point out that William Allen White's mind is his own, and begosh he has a right to state what's in it, as long as he does not give aid and comfort to a foreign enemy in time of war.

If we trade off liberty for coal it will be a sorry trade. Liberty is worth more than anthracite. Heaven send us the wisdom to see it.

Free Labor.

Some ways you take them, the Americans are a complacent folk, little given to fussing about the future provided they can get through today without too much trouble. In the public affairs of China, tomorrow is often pawned to satisfy the requirements of today; and then they sell the pawn ticket. Evils are not fought and killed outright, but compromised with, in order to postpone a troublesome settlement and secure peace for the moment. So fundamentals are sacrificed to details and superficialities, principles to expedients; until the whole land groans under an accumulation of evils and bad old customs that have acquired, through centuries of popular acquiescence, the immunity of privilege and the status of vested interests. It used to be said that in this country nothing was settled until it was settled right. But through the vagaries of modern education, which seems to see no universal truths anywhere, nothing fundamental, no fixed principles, but all things relative and all in flux, we appear to have arrived in large numbers at the popular view that there is nothing which is generally right, and so it is well to settle things any old way as long as we can get them settled for the next few days. What comes after that can take care of itself.

Some of us seem, for example, to have lost the view that men have a fundamental right to their lives and liberties, and to work when and where they will as long as they behave themselves—that, in the words of President Harding, free men willing to work have a right to work in safety. Large numbers of our people seem ready to throw away that principle in return for what they call "industrial peace." Or, if they are not willing to throw it away themselves, they seem willing that their politicians in office should throw it away for them. We believe this easy tolerance arises out of popular ignorance of the general interest in the maintenance of personal rights. Those rights do not concern merely the strikebreaker, or so-called scab, and they are not to be secured to him merely on his account. They constitute so definite and concrete an interest, that leaving aside all abstractions and generalities, they are an essential part of the right of the public to be served with transportation and with coal and everything else at rates that have not been inflated by means involving the murder of guards and strikebreakers.

For, every strike makes it necessary, if it is possible, to charge more for the service of the commodity the strikers help produce. Labor has a right to strike. But this does not mean license to commit murder, or to slug scabs, or to intimidate non-union citizens willing to work. The public is entitled to have such men work, if they are willing to do so, and in the long run it is the public that pays the bills.

Union members do not acquire by going on strike any rights, privileges, or legal powers they did not have before they struck. Strikebreakers do not lose any rights by being strikebreakers. This is fundamental, and it is vital to all important human interests. No philosophy of pink Bolshevism in universities or dilettantes' drawing-rooms, can be permitted to undermine the stones of this foundation. Nor can our poor old political Pumblechook of a governor evade his responsibility for maintaining this essential part of the social fabric by passing the buck to Sheriff Gum. He well knows that no sheriff, placed as Sheriff Gum was placed, can rely on a local posse to preserve the rights of strikebreakers, and the rights of the general public.

This proposition should have been so clear to everybody in the nation that President Harding should never have had to restate it in his message to the governors. That "free men willing to work may work in safety" is not merely the right of the men themselves, it is the right of all society, and it is the concern of all society; not merely for the sake of maintaining a general principle of right that has been clouded and obscured by a lot of sentimental soap-box and pulpit humbug about "social justice," but also for its ultimate effect on prices. That may seem a sordid consideration, but it has this value: it can be understood by hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are so lacking in imagination and the power to visualize a general social principle that they suppose a strike is only a struggle between the boss and the hired man, and "ought" to be settled on a basis of generosity; and whose sympathies are with the apparently weaker side even to the extent of palliating foul fighting and the unpunished murders of Williamson County, Illinois, as long as they fail to realize that the whole public will ultimately pay for strike murders in dollars and cents.

Let us get back to fundamentals in thinking about this matter. Time is wasted and the issue is confused in discussing the conditions and the details of private business. The public has a right to use the services of miners and operators, if miners and operators wish to serve the public, under conditions of peace—not industrial peace, for that is, and in a free country will probably long remain, an idle dream—but under just the conditions laid down by the President of the United States a week ago, "CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH FREE MEN, WILLING TO WORK, MAY WORK IN SAFETY." Thus far, that is President Harding's best official utterance. Thereby he asserted fundamental American doctrine and focused public attention on it, and at the same time bawled out the political governors in great style and possibly shamed some of them into doing their duty. Perhaps some, like Governor Sproul of Pennsylvania, did not need it, but we think of some that did, and one of them not far away. This is the thing of paramount importance to the public, the thing that is fundamental.

No other questions are relevant until this question has been settled; not merely shoved off and evaded, Chinese fashion, for the sake of easy peace and more coal this winter. It would be a bad thing if the great, helpless, Eastern centres of population should find themselves in the grip of the terrible Eastern winter, short of coal, or their mills short of power. But unpunished murder is worse, no matter for what cause committed. The rail executives show a disposition to fight this economic battle through to a finish. The public will serve its own best interests by demanding from its officials that the fight be conducted according to the rules of the game, namely, the law of organized society, and not rules made for the protection of murderers. Maintain the rights of free men in this country, and the trains will move and the coal will be forthcoming; and the officials brave enough to do it need fear no political punishment. The masses of the people have no sympathy with murder. And they know, if they think about it at all, that the deputy sheriff murdered while guarding railroad property at Tracy last week, and who left a widow and child, was sacrificed to coward politics.

Editorial Notes.

London was disappointed because Chief Justice Taft was less rotund than they expected. We felt the same way in this country about Gilbert K. Chesterton.

Plans are going forward in Shanghai for the establishment of an American school, in order that the children of Americans in China may be educated without having to be sent home. Land has been purchased and a temporary building will be ready for the autumn term. Nearly every American in Shanghai is a contributor to the fund, as well as many in the outports.

It will be interesting just now to recall the answer Governor Altgeld of Illinois received from the President of the United States to his protest against the use of Federal troops to prevent the interference of strikers with the movement of the mails. It read: "While I am still persuaded that I have not transcended my authority or duty in the emergency that confronts us, it seems to me that in this hour of danger and public distress discussion may well give way to active effort on the part of all authority to restore obedience to the law and to protect life and property.—Grover Cleveland."

If you expect to have any influence on the August primaries, you will have to make sure of your registration. All registration previous to December 31, 1921, was canceled on that date. To vote at the August primaries, new registration is necessary, and it closes by state law at midnight on July 29th, the date of this issue of the Argonaut. The registrar's office is in the City Hall, and probably he will not turn anybody out that is inside his doors before midnight of July 29th. But there is no use waiting that long. If you take your citizenship seriously you will be registered before that time arrives. And at this primary there is something to vote for: a candidate for United States senator, for one thing.

A Pertinent Suggestion.

NATIONAL ORANGE COMPANY.

RIVERSIDE, CAL., July 24, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I noticed with pleasure your article with portions of Mr. Hughes' talk before the educators. It seems to me to be a good opportunity for the University of California to secure a good man for its head by offering it to Mr. Hughes, and paying what is necessary to get him. It might be rather revolutionary from the present-day standpoint of what constitutes education, but there should be some action obtained along right lines with Mr. Hughes as its head.

Sentiment Is Against It.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 21, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Personal observations in twenty counties, supplemented by reliable information as to conditions in sections I have not visited, convince me that the proposed $500,000,000 Water and Power Act will be soundly beaten. Instead of gaining support the measure is steadily losing, and as a slide once started generally goes farther than any one expects the defeat will likely be a rout.

Of the several straws denoting the direction of the wind, two seem to me an infallible index of the state of the public mind. First, the press of the state has ranged itself against the act in the proportion of five to one in Northern California and nearly ten to one in Southern California. In a city or a county a cause sometimes wins with little or no newspaper support, but lack of such support in a state-wide fight means that public sentiment runs strongly the other way. The second straw is that large numbers of county officials who are candidates for reelection have signed the membership cards of the Greater California League, pledging opposition to the Water and Power Act. This would not be so if even an active minority in such communities favored the measure. County candidates always keep an ear close to the ground, and they are convinced that this year the people are in no mood to approve a half-billion-dollar bond issue.

Correcting Lloyd George.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 24, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The Manchester Guardian informs us that in June Lloyd George at Cricieth, in Wales, was present at the laying of the foundation stone of a monument to be erected in commemoration of the men that died during the war. In his ceremonial speech he said: "These young men went to France, to Gallipoli, to Mesopotamia, to Palestine and elsewhere. What was the reason that prompted them to leave their homes? They did not have to repulse an invader, to prevent the pillaging of their hearths. They went to defend right and equity. They thus fought for peoples they did not know, whose language they did not understand." Such words are beyond measure. If the fact is true that the British nation fought an over-four-year war in the interest of a cause other than her own, and that she sacrificed thereby hundreds of thousands of lives for France and Belgium, merely for a show of sentimental chivalry, the British ministers responsible for having dragged their country into such a strife, are in a thoroughly bad position. The full truth is that the British nation was compelled to fight to defend and safeguard her independence, same as the French, Belgian, and other nations were compelled to do. Why should Lloyd George voluntarily blind himself to this fact? Is it so that he can refuse to see it? Does he want the British nation to ignore it? Why does he misrepresent the truth to his countrymen? Have his words for object to separate his country more and more from the entente cordiale? Or is it merely to feed flatteries to the display of pseudo-generosity? Lord Grey lately said: "Our frontier in future will not be the English Channel, but the Rhine." The full truth is: Had Germany ever succeeded in taking Calais, Dunkerque, and the French North Sea Coast, the history of the war would have resulted very differently for every one of the Allies.

JORIS VAN ANTWERPEN.

Apropos of the many congresses held since the armistice, a correspondent of the London Morning Post has unearthed the following letter from Chateaubriand, written in 1822, when he was French ambassador in London: "Since the Congress of Vienna and that of Aix-la-Chapelle the princes of Europe had had their head turned by congresses. That is where they went for amusement and to share out among themselves a few nations. Hardly had the congress which started at Laibach, and was continued at Trothen, come to an end, when they thought of convoking another at Vienna, at Ferrara, or at Verona."

According to the estimate of Professor Edward R. A. Seligman of Columbia University, there are now 18,000,000,000,000 Russian rubles in existence. They are made of paper, and it takes 260,000 of them to equal one ruble, gold. If cheap money could make prosperity Russia would be the happiest country in the world.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

DIRECT RELATIONS WITH CANADA. (New York Tribune.)

The visit of Premier Mackenzie King of Canada to the United States may well mark an important milestone in America's foreign relations. He came primarily to discuss the agreement regarding the unfortified border between the two countries. He spoke of the importance of this frontier in the international relations of the world. But he said nothing about the fact that this agreement, negotiated direct between London and Washington, was now being discussed direct between Canada and the United States.

In the old days—and as a matter of fact until two years ago—London determined the foreign relations of the British Empire. Since 1920, however, Canada has had the right, so far unused, of naming its own representative in Washington, with the rank of minister, and empowered to deal with all questions arising in the relations of Canada and the United States.

Whether or not Mr. Mackenzie King intends to avail himself of this right and appoint a Canadian minister, his visit to Washington is the first important step in direct diplomatic relations between the two countries. If a new treaty is made with Canada to supplement the Rush-Bagot agreement, it will be the first fruit of these new relations.

The keen understanding of American and Canadian problems shown by the present British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, is doubtless the reason why Canada has not yet appointed a minister to the United States. But the authorization of such an appointment, marking a great and almost revolutionary departure in Britain's methods of conducting her foreign relations, is a recognition by Great Britain that there are many questions concerning the United States and Canada which can best be solved by direct Canadian representation in Washington. Such questions as the St. Lawrence Canal, fishing rights, railroad intercommunication, and even Panama Canal tolls have a special significance for Canada and are not, properly speaking, questions of empire. Such, also, is the present proposal to revise the unarmed border agreement.

It will be interesting to see whether the Canadian premier will follow up his visit and discussions by establishing permanent direct diplomatic relations between the two countries.

A CANADIAN TREATY OF PEACE.

(Philadelphia Bulletin.)

The first American reaction to the Canadian proposal to terminate the existing Rush-Bagot agreement which has resulted in leaving the border between this country and Canada unfortified for an extent of more than 3000 miles, may well be a feeling of regret at in any way touching or altering this historic pact. Never has an international agreement worked more to the satisfaction of all parties in interest, and it has been a symbol to the rest of the world of the good time to come when the spirit of the agreement, enacted by nation after nation, shall banish the dread of war from the world.

There has been no knowledge heretofore that the agreement as it stands was not perfectly satisfactory in wording or implication, although there have been hints that American revenue men and "dry" officials occasionally felt hampered by its literal interpretation.

The explanations of Mackenzie King, the Dominion prime minister, now in Washington, as to Canada's motives for seeking the change, leave the matter somewhat clouded. But it is significant that the new pact is to be no longer a simple agreement between this country and Great Britain as the Dominion's international guardian, but a formal treaty negotiated by Canada with this country, as equal to equal.

There has been an unexplained hitch in the arrangement to have Canada send her own minister plenipotentiary to Washington. Canada now may wish to make as striking an assertion of her claim to freedom of action in foreign affairs by a gesture that shall proclaim to the world that on the most intimate matter of national concern, one affecting the country's defense and safety, she is competent to act for herself.

It may be assumed that the treaty will carry out the spirit of the time-honored agreement. In that case it may be considered of good omen that the first step of the Dominion in independent diplomacy will be one sealing peace for all time to come with her neighbor on the south.

THEY LOVE A SHINING MARK.

(Owens Valley Herald.)

Why is it that agitators of various political beliefs will always pick upon a prosperous community to expound their theories and try to establish their experimental and disrupting doctrines?

California, a state the most advanced in hydro-electric power development of any state in the Union, and with rates for current lower than elsewhere in the country, is facing a constitutional amendment to authorize an expenditure of $500,000,000 by the state for hydro-electric and water development. The proposed measure would put in jeopardy some $600,000,000 now invested by private property in hydro-electric properties.

The builders of existing power projects in California have been pioneers in long-distance distribution of electric energy and have led the world in this field. If the state adopts the socialistic scheme it would automatically prevent further development of power by private capital in California.

The future of the state's power resources would be in the hands of five political appointees and power requirements of various sections would be considered from the standpoint of political expediency rather than from the standpoint of public necessity. Private property rights under the law are scattered to the four winds.

Thus do the agitators pick on a prosperous state to expound their doctrines and fasten the burden of an increasing tax bill. If the measure is successfully passed in California the promoters of the scheme will immediately extend their agitation to adjoining states.

THE TEST.

(New York Times.)

It has become ridiculous and preposterous for senators to worry the President with their legislative tangles and party anxieties. The tasks now thrust upon him make theirs sink into nothingness. Alongside the coal strike and the railway trouble, the tariff looks positively silly, the bonus like a mad freak, and the ship subsidy more fantastically foolish than ever. All this small dust in the balance is to be swept aside when issues that touch the authority of the government and the very life of the nation are being weighed.

The rejection by the mine workers of President Harding's offer of arbitration and a commission to reorganize the soft coal industry is based, not upon reason shown, but upon stark power. Their demand is that the owners, the public and the government, give in to them first and do the investigating and arbitrating afterward. Their tacit assumption is obvious. It is that the country is now on such short rations of coal and so afraid of what the winter may bring that it will submit to anything. But certainly the government of the United States can not yield to terrorism.

One thing it can make clear beyond any shadow of doubt. This is that it will throw the amplest protection around any who are willing to do the work of mining coal or transporting food and merchandise over the railroads. There must be no more unionist lynch law as at Herrin. The strikers assert that they are indispensable; that men can not be found to do their work in the pits or the shops. That is not proved. If the matter is tried out and if substitutes come forward the government is bound to see to it that they are made safe. It will be a test, if it comes, not of labor-union theories, but of the dignity and power of the American government.

WILLS AND THEIR WAYS.

(Washington Post.)

Every one knows what an important thing a will is. It does seem a little peculiar that a man or woman who has shuffled off this mortal coil and reached the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns, and who may therefore be considered to have no further concern with subunary affairs, should yet have a great deal to say in the appointment here of so many blocks of stock, there of so many parcels of real estate and elsewhere of so many horses, automobiles, pieces of furniture and dollars and cents. A great deal, be it noted, but not all, for the law wisely limits what a testator can do. Thus, as early as 1279, one finds the enactment of the first of those many statutes of mortmain which were designed to prevent clergymen from frightening dying persons into conveying or bequeathing their lands for charitable or ecclesiastical purposes. Similarly, most of the states of this country have special acts which safeguard the interests of the family of a decedent from any gross abuse of the exercise of the will-making power.

The case of those persons who, while in full possession of health and testamentary capacity, vociferously assert that their wills are already made and all their affairs in order and yet are found intestate when the final summons comes is admirably illustrated by Dickens in "David Copperfield" in the person of Mr. Spenlow, who lived among wills, was always dilating on the necessity of making a will and yet made none himself and left everything concerning his estate at sixes and sevens.

Then there is the case of the man who draws hundreds of perfectly unassailable wills for others, but blunders irremediably when he comes to make his own. Instances of that character are almost beyond count. The most recent example is that of the lawyer who left money to endow a library bearing his name at a university, but whose will was declared invalid by the appellate division of the superior court of New York because it did not comply with the decedent estate law of the state.

The moral seems to be: Make your will betimes, but get some one else to draw it up.

SPARE THOSE OLIVES!

(Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

Merchants of Seville, Spain, have sent a cask of olives to Philadelphia. The cask remains undelivered because it was addressed to the president of the Sesqui-Centennial Association, and at the moment there is no such person. Mayor Moore, who occupied that position at the time the shipment was made, has sidestepped the Spanish perquisite of office, and there is none to do it honor. There is a movement to ship it back to its donors; but we trust this gesture will not prevail. There are several uses to which the gift may be put if it is kept here.

In the first place, it might serve as a useful memento of the fact that somebody believes the exposition is to be held. It is true the somebody in question lives as far away from the scene of action as Seville and is presumably not in close touch with recent developments; but sober thought will convince those of the larger vision that these facts make the memento all the more significant. For under the circumstances the cask of olives apotheosizes faith in the abstract. And faith of that kind is what is needed more than anything else at the moment in connection with the Sesqui-Centennial Exposition.

From this viewpoint, it would be a fitting thing if the cask of olives were taken from the seclusion of the dark storage where it reposes and mounted high upon the crown of Penn's hat above the City Hall where all might see it. There it might serve as an inspiration to the faint-hearted.

But its uses do not stop there. One of the objectors to the exposition has pointed out that one of the principal drawbacks to holding it would be that as many as a thousand children a day would be lost and have to be taken care of. We do not know exactly how many olives a cask contains, but we feel sure it is more than a thousand. In other words, ready at hand we have at least a day's supply of comforts for the children. What lost child would bewail the miseries of life in general if it were given an olive to make acquaintance and thus had a private misery of its own to concentrate on comfortably and conveniently?

Moreover, there will have to be innumerable dinners given in order to get the plans for the exposition into shape. Nowadays it is the fashion to transact business by committees and how can a committee function except around a banquet table? In this cask of olives, provided they are not given to the children, we have the nucleus of innumerable hors d'œuvres courses, and at no cost to the management. The exposition's affairs should be conducted economically, and right here is where the start should be made.

So we are strong for keeping the cask of olives. If a president of the Fair Association is elected tomorrow, he should be required to execute a waiver of any title he might have to the cask as his individual property. To retain it would amount to accepting a valuable consideration while in office. And when we say that, we have in mind not so much the olives as the cask.

In its first bulletin, published December, 1921, the Tax Reduction League said: "You can secure the reduction of taxes on demand provided the voice that makes the demand is recognized as the voice of the organized majority." Siskiyou County, says the league's bulletin, took this statement at its face value, organized a County Taxpayers' Association, and within six months was practically assured a 25 per cent. reduction in county taxes. More than that, by the end of six months county officials who had resented the "inquisitiveness" of the association were inviting the association officers to help the board of supervisors with their "advice," and county employees were volunteering to accept salary reductions.

Word comes from Santiago de Cuba that posthumous honors were paid there in the form of a bust and a tablet to Sir Lampton Lorraine, British rear-admiral, who in 1873 is credited with having averted war between the United States and Spain by threatening to shell Santiago if the Spanish authorities executed any more of the crew and passengers of the Virginia, captured while running arms and volunteers to the Cubes in the Ten Years' War.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

James Eads Howe is known as "the Millionaire Hobo." He likes traveling, but does not care for the end-door type of Pullman.

The oldest living graduate of Columbia University is Dr. Stephen Smith, on whom his alma mater recently conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Science. He is in his hundredth year.

Capablanca, the world's chess champion, recently played forty opponents simultaneously at Paris. He went up and down a long row of chess boards, and a moment's glance was said to be enough to enable him to defeat almost any attack.

Miss Georgette La Motte of Oklahoma is a real musical prodigy, having played the piano since her fourth year and appeared in concerts since she was seven. She is now fifteen years old and has gone to Paris to continue her musical education.

Charles Lee Patten, now one of the White House gardeners, was associated with President Harding when the latter was in active newspaper work at Marion, Ohio. Patten is eighty-two years old, and is said to be strong for a Harding second term.

The increasing modernity of China is exemplified in the case of Mupia Ju, daughter of Director Ju Cho Man, of the South China government. Mupia Ju is a regular member of the air forces of South China, and in the present disturbed condition of things takes her turn with the men pilots in the flying patrol.

Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, president of the American College for Girls at Constantinople, is a native of New Hampshire, and studied at Heidelberg, Zurich, Leipzig and Berlin. Among her practical works is a translation of a text-book on physiology into Armenian, but she has also devoted intensive study to Sextus Empiricus, and to Sappho.

T. H. Caraway, junior senator from Arkansas, who has been leading the fight against Attorney-General Harry A. Daugherty, has been in public life less than a decade. He served eight years in the House of Representatives, and has been in the Senate little more than a year. His father, a country doctor in Missouri, was assassinated in a feud growing out of the hatreds of the civil war.

Captain James A. Pedlow, the American Red Cross commissioner to Budapest, is said to be the most popular man in the Hungarian capital. Out of gratitude for his relief work among the starving war victims, the Hungarian government has erected a monument to him in the city park, which was recently unveiled on the seventy-fifth birthday of Count Apponyi, the "grand old man" of Hungary.

Alexander Hume Ford, editor of the Mid-Pacific Magazine and director of the Pan-Pacific Union, which is calling a general conference in Honolulu for next October, is an indefatigable worker in the interest of the Hawaiian Islands and everything pertaining to their security and advancement. He is a former Chicago newspaper man, having served on Victor Lawson's Daily News. He is mainly responsible for the introduction of Chicago energy into the dreamy isles of the North Pacific.

Field Marshal Earl Haig is shortly to reënter the liquor trade, with which he was formerly connected as a director of the prominent firm of John Haig & Co. The controlling interest in the company was acquired in 1919 by the Distillers' Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, holding corporation for one of the largest group of whisky interests in the world. The field marshal will join the distillers' board in July. His family has been connected with the Haig Company since 1877, his father having been one of the founders.

Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, the sculptress and New York society leader, received the honorary degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University last month. Mrs. Whitney was Gertrude Vanderbilt, daughter of Cornelius Vanderbilt, and married Harry Payne Whitney, the capitalist, in 1896. She will be remembered in San Francisco as the sculptor of the wonderful reliefs that embellished the the Fountain of El Dorado in the west wing-court of the Tower of Jewels at the Exposition. Among her principle works are the Aztec Fountain in the Pan-American Building at Washington, and the Titanic Memorial for the same city.

The Princess Jolanda di Savoia, daughter of King Victor Emmanuel III of Italy, and fiancée of Crown Prince Leopold of Belgium, was born at the Quirinal Palace, Rome, June 1, 1901, not quite a year after the assassination of her grandfather, King Umberto, at Monza. She is what the Italians call a "fervida sports-woman," which may account for the fact that the Prince of Wales found her a good pal. She generally accompanies her father on his hunting and shooting excursions, and thus keeps up the traditions of the chase of the House of Savoy. The park at Stupingi, famous for its pheasants, and the Valley of the Aosta, equally renowned for its chamois, are the places where she finds the best sport. The princess is fond of riding to hounds, and takes delight in the fox hunts of the Campagna, but San Rossore and Castel Porziano are the places where she prefers to ride for the glory of motion. What makes her a complete horsewoman is the fact that she is fond of horse racing and takes great interest in horse breeding. This year she was a constant visitor at the exhibitions of the Parioli at Rome and of San Siro at Milan. She is extremely charitable—a trait she evidently inherits from her mother, Queen Elena.

Another Arthur Balfour—commoner and business man, not aristocrat and statesman—has arrived in Washington from England. He comes to address the national conference of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Balfour, who is no relation to the Earl of Balfour, who led the British delegation at the Armament Conference, is a former master cutler of Sheffield, one of the blue ribbon honors of British industry. He is president of one of the principal steel-making corporations in the United Kingdom, a one time president of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce, and during the war was a prominent factor in the munitions industry. Tool steel is a branch in which Balfour is an expert and regarding which he has written a standard book. He comes to Washington as vice-president of the Associated Chamber of Commerce of Great Britain.

The Evening Star.

Star that bringest home the bee,
And sett'st the weary laborer free!
If any star shed peace, 't is thou,
That send'st it from above,
Appearing when heaven's breath and brow
Are sweet as her we love.

Come to the luxuriant skies,
Whilst the landscape's odors rise,
Whilst far-off lowing herds are heard,
And songs when toil is done,
From cottages whose smoke unstirred
Curls yellow in the sun.

Star of love's soft interviews,
Parted lovers on thee muse;
Their remembrancer in heaven
Of thrilling vows thou art,
Too delicious to be given
By absence from the heart.—Thomas Campbell.

Morning.

In the barn the tenant cock,
Close to partlet perched on high,
Briskly crows (the shepherd's clock)
Juncund that the morning's nigh.

Swiftly from the mountain's brow,
Shadows, nursed by night, retire;
And the peeping sunbeam now
Paints with gold the village spire.

Philomel forsakes the thorn,
Plaintive where she prates at night;
And the lark, to meet the morn,
Soars beyond the shepherd's sight.

From the low-roofed cottage ridge,
See the chattering swallow spring;
Darting through the one-arched bridge,
Quick she dips her dappled wing.

Now the pine-tree's waving top
Gently greets the morning gale:
Kidlings now begin to crop
Daisies, on the dewy dale.

From the balmy sweets, uncloyed
(Restless till her task be done),
Now the busy bee's employed
Sipping dew before the sun.

Trickling through the creviced rock,
Where the limpid stream distils,
Sweet refreshment waits the flock
When 't is sun-drove from the hills.

Colin's for the promised corn
(Ere the harvest hopes are ripe)
Anxious;—whilst the huntsman's horn,
Boldly sounding, drowns his pipe.

Sweet, O sweet, the warbling throng,
On the white emblossomed sprav!
Nature's universal song
Echoes to the rising day.—John Cunningham.

The Owl.

In the hollow tree, in the old gray tower,
The spectral owl doth dwell;
Dull, hated, despised, in the sunshine hour,
But at dusk he's abroad and well!
Not a bird of the forest e'er mates with him;
All mock him outright by day;
But at night, when the woods grow still and dim,
The boldest will shrink away!
O, when the night falls, and roosts the fowl,
Then, then, is the reign of the horned owl!

And the owl hath a bride, who is fond and bold,
And loveth the wood's deep gloom;
And, with eyes like the shine of the moonstone cold,
She awaiteth her ghastly groom;
Not a feather she moves, not a carol she sings,
As she waits in her tree so still;
But when her heart heareth his flapping wings,
She hoots out her welcome shrill!
O, when the moon shines, and dogs do howl,
Then, then, is the joy of the horned owl!

Mourn not for the owl, nor his gloomy plight!
The owl hath his share of good:
If a prisoner he be in the broad daylight,
He is lord in the dark greenwood!
Nor lonely the bird, nor his ghastly mate,
They are each unto each a pride;
Thrice fonder, perhaps, since a strange, dark fate
Hath rent them from all beside!
So, when the night falls, and dogs do howl,
Sing, ho! for the reign of the horned owl!
We know not always
Who are kings by day,
But the king of the night is the bold brown owl!

AMERICAN POLITICAL CHANGES.

Author of the "Mirrors of Washington" Shows What Has Been Going On Behind Them.

That masked bandit of American political writers, the unknown author of "The Mirrors of Washington," has been at it again, emboldened by success and the fact that his former book went unpunished. In the language of the street, he got away with it once and now he has come back. This time it is "Behind the Mirrors." He has scraped the silvering off, and is grinning through the bare glass, not enough of him, to be sure, to enable us to identify him, but enough to let us see that it is the same mocking devil who blasphemed against the Lord's anointed before. His views of politics are heterodox and sinful and not at all to be approved by any good reformer; and yet there is a spice in reading him that will appeal to the worst instincts of the best of us, and that is a great blessing these July days—like taking a nip from the tenor's flask in the choir loft.

"Mirrors" thinks we are on the way to being governed by blocs, despite President Harding's trouble with them and his abhorrence of them. Party government has been knocked into the convenient cocked hat, party responsibility is gone, there is nothing left but a balance between the farm bloc, the labor bloc, the banking bloc, the manufacturers' bloc, the packers' bloc and the shoe-makers' bloc, the free wool bloc and the Ohio woolen tariff bloc and all the little blocs that can trade around among the big ones—and the rest of us, that do not belong to a bloc, can have what the blocs leave, if they leave it. He does not go that length, quite, but it is only a step there from the point to which he does go. He has analyzed some facts and seen some tendencies in our political drift that are worth noting and remembering, c. g.:

Nor until the beginning of this century did it ever occur to us that the President was the head of his party. The control of the organization had been in other hands, in Hanna's or Quay's or Cameron's, or divided among a group of men like these three, who represented the interests of business in the parties, and often also in the Senate.

The idea that the executive was the party's head was merely a happy afterthought which was adopted to justify the resort to the line of least resistance in creating a stronger government at Washington, the concentration upon one man to represent the national will. We had simply done what other peoples had so often done in the history of mankind. When the English wished to weaken the rule of the great barons they magnified the office of the king. When we wished to get away from the rule of the barons of business we magnified the office of our elective king, the President. We invented new reasons for an old expedient.

And by making the amplified executive the head of his party, which we did—for the Quays and Hannas speedily disappeared under the new order and left no successors—we set him to sawing off the limb on which he sat. If his authority rested on that of his party then to be firm the authority of the party must be firm. For parties to endure and be strong there must be a certain quality of permanence about them. They must not rest upon personalities, but on principles and jobs, principles for the disinterested and for those whose interests are expressed in the principles, and jobs for those whose interests are less large and indirect.

Of parties with the executive as their head nothing remained but their name. The only nexus there could be between the executive and the mass of voters was personal. One year a party was Roosevelt, the next year it was Taft, and the distance between Roosevelt and Taft was the distance between East and West. A little later it even changed its name and voted in another column because Roosevelt had adopted a new party name and gone into a new column. Four years later it split up and much of it went to Wilson, who temporarily rallied a personal following just as Roosevelt had done.

And because the dispensing of jobs was an unseemly occupation for the executive we reduced by law the patronage that was available for the sustenance of parties. Thus we substituted personal caprice for the permanency of parties and at the same time cut down the practical means of holding organizations together. At the same time the decay of government by business left parties no longer an instrument of the economic will of the nation.

Thus the executive headship was wholly inconsistent with government by parties, upon which our magnified President was supposed to rest. A further inconsistency was that we adopted another theory for strengthening one-man power. This was that the President was the leader of the people. Have we a government by parties there? Not at all; the power of the executive rests upon something outside of and superior to parties.

The old party bosses are dead. No machine leader will control as many delegates in the next national convention as will Mr. Gray Silver. So far as delegates are now led they are led by senators and representatives. A Senate group chose Mr. Harding at Chicago. And senators and representatives lie at the mercy of organized minorities.

Now here is political philosophy; not idealistic, but based on realities, proceeding from facts. Whether they have become petrified into permanence, or whether we can go back to the original theory that the country was one bloc (and at that, it was never more than a theory), is another question, which the looking-glass chappie has not attempted to answer. He is more successful as a mirror than a prophet. In fact, he is a whole hall of mirrors, of the curving, Coney Island variety, the sort that make fat men look thin, and thin men fat, and stout ladies shorter and stouter yet, and shows long ladies standing on their heads. Inasmuch as we are just great children, it is fun looking in these mirrors. Here is a pair of images, quite in the style of the first mirror book:

Mr. Vanderlip is one of our best-known business men, yet what the public knows about him is nothing. He was the president of a great bank and amassed wealth. An old financial journalist, he has a gift of speech and writing, unusual in the business world. His agreeable personality made him liked by editors. He achieved unusual publicity. Was his reputation solidly based or was it newspaper made? The public does not know, can not know. I use his case by way of illustration. Perhaps he ought to be President of the United States. But choosing a man for office on the basis of his business success, even so well known a man as Mr. Vanderlip, is plainly enough blind gambling.

Mr. Mellon is the shyest and most awkward man who ever rose to power. He is unhappy before congressional committees, before reporters in the dreadful conferences which are the outward and visible evidence of our democracy, at Cabinet meetings, where the fluent Mr. Hughes casts him terribly in the shade.

At one such meeting the President dragged him forth from silence by turning to him and asking him, "What has the Sphinx here got to say on the subject?" Thus impelled, the Secretary of the Treasury replied, unconsciously in the words of Sir Roger de Coverley, "Well, Mr. President, I think there is a good deal to be said on both sides."

Now, that amounts to positive irreverence when one has been taught that all that is needed to make this old world what it ought to be is business men on the job. (Ella Wheeler Wilcox says it is love, but there is no use telling that to a Christian people.) "Mirrors" considers business men in office quite a joke. He says they are a pioneer ideal, insinuates that their success is often a matter of luck, and asks how we expect to elect luck to office. If this isn't blasphemy we never heard any.

Some useful space is devoted to the operation of the Cabinet and the interplay of the personal forces therein represented. What "Mirrors" calls "the bottle neck of the Cabinet" is the President's mind. It all has to go through that. He is sarcastic enough, and perhaps truthful enough, to remark that if reporters were present at Cabinet meetings it would appear that the Cabinet is mainly occupied with little things. Mr. Harding's administration has been in office more than a year, but how many important policies has it adopted? he asks. How much wisdom has emerged from the bi-weekly meetings? These are hard questions, so he helps answer them by citing an example. "The Cabinet listened to the Postmaster-General explaining how much it would facilitate the handling of the mails if people would distribute the mailing of their letters throughout the day," etc. And Europe starving, and China torn in two, and India seething with the violence of peace and non-resistance and the stage set for a coal famine at home, and a railroad strike—and the Postmaster-General gravely pointing out that people ought to mend their habits of mailing letters. Yet the President is busy, all the time. If he has to give his attention to stuff like that we should think he would be. Our reflecting telescope of these starry depths says:

Listen to the experience of a Cabinet minister. One of the most important Secretaries was explaining to some friends a critical situation. "But," interjected one of the listeners, "does President Harding understand that?" "The President," replied the Secretary, "never has time really to understand anything."

And remember how Secretary Hughes told the President that the Four-Power Pact covered with its guarantees the home islands of Japan, and how a couple of days later Mr. Harding informed the press that it did not cover the home islands of Japan; when it transpired that the information of Mr. Hughes on this point had effected no lodgement in the President's mind.

The presidential mind; that is the bottle neck through which everything has to pass.

Where our actual Secretary's mind falls short of our supposititious Secretary's mind is in the valuable quality of common sense. I am even prepared to maintain that as a measure of reality Mr. Hughes' mind is distinctly inferior to Mr. Harding's, which is one reason why he never did become President and Mr. Harding did.

This is a nice word for Mr. Harding, who needs it after some of the other things our author has said about him. But he has no such charity for the senior senator from California. Of our own Hiram he remarks:

Hiram Johnson is a declining figure. I see no reason to modify the conclusion which was reached about him in the "Mirrors of Washington," that he thought more of men than of principles and especially of one man, Johnson. The test of his sincerity came when the vote was reached on the unseating of Senator Newberry for spending too much money in the Michigan primaries.

Johnson's great issue a year before had been sanctity of popular nominations. Yet when he had an opportunity to speak and act against a brazen even though foolish attempt to buy a nomination, he was rushing wildly across the continent, arriving after the vote had been taken.

On reaching Washington, he called his newspaper friends before him to explain the difficulties and delays that had made him late. When he had finished a nasal voice from the press remarked, "Senator, there will be great public sympathy with you as a victim of the railroads. But the people will only know how great their loss has been if you will tell them now how you would have voted if you had been here." Johnson adjourned the meeting hastily without a reply.

The absence from the roll-call and the theatrical attempt to make it appear accidental were typical. Johnson had won the Michigan primaries in the national campaign of 1920. The delegates were in control of Newberry's political friends. They remained firm for Johnson throughout the balloting. Johnson avoided voting against their leader although his principles required that he should lead the fight for his unseating.

Johnson has always over-emphasized Johnson. At the Progressive convention in 1912 when Roosevelt was nominated for the presidency and Johnson for the vice-presidency, it was proposed, since both were in attendance, to bring both on the stage and introduce them to the delegates. The natural order was Roosevelt first, since he was the nominee for President and since he was, moreover, one of the most distinguished figures in the world, and Johnson, since he had second place, second. But Johnson would go second to no man. Either he must show himself on the stage first or not at all. Finally it was compromised by presenting them together at the same moment, holding hands upon the platform.

One of the most exasperating things about this gentleman is his memory for hard facts. He is a Gradgrind. Opposition to Gradgrinds does not follow from the iniquity or the folly of being a Gradgrind, but from the extreme efficacy of Gradgrinds as question-settlers who won't settle questions the way we think they should be settled. They are always citing something uncomfortable that upsets our most cherished opinions. You can't handle them, so you feel that they ought to be exterminated. Does the crisis produce the man? The civil war did, and so we expect every war to do the same, but will it? Here is his view of it:

We put our faith in the jack-of-all-trades and the amateur. We have the cheerful notion that the "crisis produces the man." This is nothing more than the justice illusion which is lodged in the minds of men, an idea, religious in its origin, that no time of trial would arrive unless the man to meet it were benignantly sent along with it, a denial of human responsibility, an encouragement to the happy-go-lucky notion that everything always comes out all right in the end.

The world, in going through the greatest crisis in history, has controverted this cheerful belief, for it has not produced "the man" either here or elsewhere. No one appeared big enough to prevent the war. No one appeared big enough to shorten the war. No one appeared big enough to effect a real peace. And no one appeared big enough to guide this country wisely either in the war or in the making of peace, which is still going on.

Only in parliamentary life is there enough permanency and enough opportunity for the breeding of statesmen. We shall never have them while the presidency with its hazards and its wastes is stressed as it has been in recent years.

I have based my minorities upon self-interest, thus introducing into our government the selfish interests banished therefrom twenty years ago. Their banishment was an achievement of virtue. Their reintroduction is the accomplishment of good sense. They are the great quality while the world thinks as it does.

You have in this combination the spontaneous wisdom of the masses, if that is where wisdom generates. You have the wisdom of the few, if you believe in impregnation from above, and you have the wisdom of selfishness, if you believe as most of us do in the enlightenment of self-interest. And no one ever located wisdom anywhere else than in these three places, for the first, as I might easily demonstrate, is the modern democratic name for the wisdom of God; the second is the wisdom of men; and the third is the wisdom of the serpent; beside which there are no other wisdoms.

In fact, the reflecting gentleman appears to have put his finger on what might be called the dynamism of society. He has taken the machine apart and found out what makes it go—self-interest, an unbeautiful, ungenerous, unchivalrous thing, but the persistent thing in human affairs, and the productive thing, the thing without which it would be very difficult, and some think impossible, for society to get on. He may qualify his thesis with the phrase, "while the world thinks as it does"—but it has been thinking that way a long time.

What are we to expect from this bloc government, government by the interplay of organized minorities? It is rather nebulous, but having the depicting habit our author proceeds to try and answer by personal pictures:

To Mr. Lodge's petulant, imperious gesture—the sharp hand-clap for the pages—would succeed Mr. Silver's fixing gesture, that of a country merchant smoothing out a piece of silk before a customer at a counter. Mr. Silver as he talks performs one constant motion, a gentle slow moving of both hands horizontally, palms down.

Mr. Silver is a lobbyist with the powers of a dictator, or a dictator with the habits of a lobbyist, whichever way you wish to look at it. A former farmer, member of the West Virginia legislature, representative of farm organizations at Washington, he rules the Senate with more power than Mr. Lodge has or Mr. Harding has, but always with the gentle touch of a general-storekeeper, spreading the wrinkles out of a yard of satin.

But even this little lobbyist has a certain definiteness which public men generally lack. His feet are firmly placed upon reality. He speaks for a solid body of opinion. He is a positive rather than a negative force. He represents a fairly united minority which knows what it wants, and men are strong or weak according as they are or are not spokesmen of a cause; and the selfish interest of a group easily takes on the pious aspect of a cause.

It is always better to deal with principals than with agents. Gray Silver, Colonel John H. Taylor, the Apollo of the soldiers' bonus lobby, perfect ladies' man in appearance, who is full of zeal also for a cause, that of those who did not make money out of the war and who should in common justice make it all the rest of their lives out of the peace, and Wayne B. Wheeler, the fanatic leader of the dries, are all more real men than those who do their bidding in the Senate and the House.

This doesn't get us far, nor into any very definite field. Like most satire, it is not creative, only ground-clearing for what building may seem requisite. In fact, the author makes quite a struggle for a "happy ending," but it is doubtful if he accomplishes it. "We do not breed men in this country," he dares to say, and directly one thinks of a dozen. "An immense inertia develops between theoretical self-government and the practical reluctance of humanity to be governed by anything short of the heavenly hosts. . . . To overcome this inertia, minorities whose interests can not wait upon the slow, benevolent processes of determinism or upon the divine rightness of public opinion form to prod the constitutional organs of government into action. Mr. Gray Silver, the silk smoother, and Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, the Puritan fanatic, are both just as much parts of the government as Mr. Harding." And he might have included Samuel Gompers and John L. Lewis and B. M. Jewel. But Einstein has given us a new theory of the universe, man tends to become again "the measure of all things," and so great individuals may in time emerge. It never would have occurred to any one but a satirist who had scraped the silvering off the mirror in order to grin through it at the world to go to Einstein for a happy ending.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 22, 1922, were $140,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $124,300,000; an increase of $15,800,000.

It is the duty of all good citizens to bow to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, no matter how drastic they may be. The Central Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads are applying to the court for a rehearing in the case recently decided which so seriously affects both of said roads, not from any disloyalty to the court, but in the hope that they roads have been operated as one system—should have great weight with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

As long as twenty-three years ago the government arranged with the Southern Pacific for payment of the Central Pacific debt of fifty-eight million dollars to Uncle Sam. The Southern Pacific had been in control of the Central Pacific for twenty-nine years then, and its was through that control that the government got its money. After over half a century of real progress in furnishing the Pacific Coast the railroad system we all approve, some way should be found in fairness to continue that operation as we are accustomed to have it, and as we understand it, because it fits our business.

The people of the Pacific Coast will be a unit in favor of allowing the present relations and management of the roads to remain as they are. To separate the systems, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, would visit inconvenience and hindrance upon every business interest and all the people of this Coast. It is generally believed, and devoutly hoped, that the preference of the people of this Coast for the systems remaining as they are, will be a deciding factor in the solution of these questions by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The roads are so interwoven, in both construction and operation, that it is almost a physical impossibility to separate them. Any kind of separation so far suggested is really a modified form of merger, but why modify a merger that has never been a merger at all, but for every practical public purpose has been one transportation concern?

If the Southern Pacific is compelled to sell the stock of the Central Pacific it could not, of course, acquire the stock at such sale. The control of the Central Pacific would, of necessity, pass to some other railroad, possibly to the Union Pacific, but would that road have any better right to acquire the Central Pacific, under the Sherman law, than the Southern Pacific?

The loss of the Central Pacific would so cripple the Southern Pacific as to render it powerless to function in the future for the good of California and Oregon, as it has done in the past. It behooves every one on this Coast who believes that the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific relationship should not be disturbed to give public expression to his views on the subject. Only by very prompt and persistent action on the part of the influential citizens of the Coast can we be saved from a most serious business calamity. Southern Pacific people have done well in asking the Supreme Court for its further consideration, for our highest court seeks to follow the path of wisdom. Let us not waiver in the faith that the problem will be solved to the satisfaction of the public using Southern Pacific service and approving it. This no doubt can and will be accomplished by lawful processes.

It cost the Michigan Central 15 per cent. less to have its repair work done by outside contractors paying their skilled mechanics 1.05 an hour and upwards, on the piece work plan, than it cost to do the same work in the Jackson shops of the company, where the men were getting 77 cents an hour. The shop men are striking against a reduction of wages and the railroad is striking against inefficiency. The public is striking against inefficiency, too, for the public has to pay for it in freight and passenger rates. The real issue is not wages, but work.

Dominating factors in the business outlook at this time include easier credit conditions, as evidenced by the general reduction in discount rates here and abroad, further reduction in unemployment, with an actual shortage of skilled workers developing at Detroit and elsewhere, and a better condition in the retail trade, which has felt the stimulus of an upward trend in many lines, says Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in its monthly letter.

Per contra, the most serious present influence retarding progress in all lines appears to be the attitude of labor toward readjustment. The recent railroad strike, in defiance of constituted authority and the resorts to violence in the coal fields, can only delay progress and react to the particular injury of labor, which ultimately must contribute its share in price deflation. Defiance of law and order or refusal to meet fundamental economic laws would not be the sober choice of the true American citizenship which represents the backbone of labor in this free country; and the American public is firmly back of President Harding in his determination to suppress lawlessness and to protect our great industries against the march of radicalism. Confidence in the administration and its ability to reach a sane solution of these labor troubles is reflected in the favorable trend of business and the strength of the securities market.

One of the promising signs indicating a practicable basis of cooperation between capital and labor has grown out of the so-called "company unions" that have operated for some time past on the Pennsylvania Railroad System and among the "Big Five" packers. These direct representatives of the company employees in conference with the company managements have been able to settle all controversial questions without resorting to strikes, by reason, it would seem, of the more human contact between employer and employee.

Pittsburgh estimates indicate that the production of steel ingots in the six months ending June 30th last was about 16,000,000 gross tons, as compared with 9,000,000 gross tons in the last half of 1921 and of 10,000,000 gross tons in the first six months of last year. Further increase in unfilled orders by the United States Steel Corporation at June 30th reflects continued betterment in the industry.

New evidence of the increased activity of the manufacturers of the United States comes to the surface in the latest reports of their importation of manufacturing material of the class for which they rely upon foreign countries. Official reports of the value of the manufacturing material imported in May of the current year show, says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York, an increase of 33 per cent. in the value of the raw material imported when compared with the same month of last year, and an increase of over 60 per cent. in the value of the manufactures for further use in manufacturing.

This startling increase in the value of manufacturing material drawn from abroad in the latest month for which figures are available is the more interesting, adds the Trade Record, when we consider that the prices of many of the articles so imported are now materially lower than a year ago, and that the advance in the total value of these materials imported really means a larger increase in quantities than the mere figures of value would indicate. While the details of the May importation are not yet available, those of April, in which the increase was also large, are at hand and show that the price at which many of the manufacturing materials were imported was less than that of a year ago. Manila hemp, for example, imported in April, 1922, came at $134 per ton against $255 in the same month of last year; sisal hemp, $109 per ton against $146; india rubber, 17 cents per pound against 21 cents; pig iron, $32 per ton against $62 in the same month of last year; copper, 12 1/2 cents per pound against 14 cents; tin, 29 cents per pound against 34 cents; leaf tobacco for cigar wrappers, $2.03 per pound against $2.17, and other tobacco, 63 cents per pound against $1.02 a year earlier; and ground wood pulp, $30 per ton against $42. In the textiles, however, cotton, wool, and silk, the 1922 prices are higher than those of a year ago, and this is also true of hides.

The board of directors of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company has just declared the thirty-second consecutive quarterly dividend of $1.50 per share on the first preferred 6 per cent. stock of this company. This marks the close of the eighth year of continuous dividend payments on this stock. As a result of this last declaration, $650,000 will be distributed among more than sixteen thousand California investors by checks which will be mailed in time to reach every one of them on August 15, 1922.

consistently for the past eight years, with the result that today there is scarcely a city, town, or hamlet anywhere in Northern and Central California that does not regularly every three months receive the blue envelopes bearing the rewards of thrift and the wages of the capital invested by local shareholders in this useful enterprise. Practically every one of these checks will be deposited in some California bank, and it is a matter of no small importance to the business men of Northern and Central California that more than two and one-half million of dollars per annum in money are thus kept at home for the benefit of California business. satisfactory, dependable, and regular return from this high-class security. One indication of this fact is that more than ten thousand of these shareholders own ten shares or less.

A syndicate headed by Cyrus Peirce & Co., and including the firms of A. B. Leach & Co. and the Payne-Weber Company, is offering a new issue of $7,500,000 collateral trust 6 per cent. bonds of the Central Indiana Power Company, according to the local offices of Cyrus Peirce & Co. The issue, which reaches maturity in 1947, is secured by all of the outstanding securities of the subsidiary companies. The Central Indiana Power Company serves consumers in the vicinity of Indianapolis.

It is enough to make a cat laugh to read the arguments that are advanced in California by the advocates of the proposed Water and Power Act which would launch the commonwealth as a state-owned power development scheme to the extent of $500,000,000 as a starter, says the Industrial News Bureau.

The ability of the state to borrow money at 1½ or 2 per cent. less interest than any private company is cited as the most important reason why the state should go into the power business on the theory that this saving would enable it to make lower rates to consumers.

Unless the state management of power projects were much more efficient than state or government management of any other undertaking the possible 2 per cent. interest saving would be more than swallowed up by overhead charges accumulated at various places in the management.

Aside from all this, however, the argument is weak and hypocritical and morally unsound unless the advocates of the measure come out flat-footedly and say that, for the same reason advanced in support of the Water and Power Act the state could secure capital more cheaply for operating our banks, our insurance companies, our wholesale houses, our transportation companies, our grocery stores, our newspapers and our farms.

If it is of such great advantage for the state to save 2 per cent. in one line of industry, it is obviously and of still greater advantage for the state to enter other lines of industry which effect even more intimately the daily life of its people than does the power business.

Why not have the state invest $500,000,000 in the production of farm products and food stuff which would be furnished to the people on the same reduced cost that is claimed for the development of state power.

Whose business is to be left free, whose is to be taken over by the state?

Are the advocates of the state Water and Power Act honest enough to come out and openly advocate state socialism? That is what their measure proposes for the "other fellow's" business.

Already we see in Russia the failure of government monopoly of business.

To revive its industrial life, Russia is again inviting foreign capital to come there and develop property.

Instead of profiting by Russia's experience, socialists in California would launch the state on a programme of state ownership, which Russia, after disastrous experiments, is already turning away from.

Pursuant to the proper approval of both the State Banking Department and the Federal Reserve Board, the Bank of Italy has converted the First National Bank of Woodland, Home Savings Bank of Woodland, with its branch at Knights Landing, the Old Bank of Hanford, the Union National Bank of San Luis Obispo and the Broadway Bank of Oakland as branches of the Bank of Italy.

The consolidation of these banks will add $10,000,000 to the resources of the Bank of Italy, giving it total assets of approximately $220,000,000. The respective resources of the various institutions to be absorbed are: First National Bank of Woodland, $1,400,000; Home Savings Bank of Woodland with its branch at Knights Landing, $2,500,000; the Old National Bank of Hanford, $2,400,000; Union National Bank of San Luis Obispo, $2,000,000, and the Broadway Bank of Oakland, $1,100,000.

Writing in a Central City (Nebraska) paper Mr. Stephens of that city claims that the municipal gas plant "will eat up the city." He contends that at the present rate of $3.25 per thousand feet of gas the plant is not self-sustaining and he objects because the burden of paying the deficit, together with interest on the bonds and for the creation of a sinking fund, falls equally upon all taxpayers in proportion to their property, whether they are users of gas or not.

This is the same thing that happens when any city goes into industrial undertakings—those who get no benefit or service must pay for those who do. Witness Seattle and its street railway as a shining example.

The big railroad strike is on. Old-time railroad workmen are losing their wages and seniority rights which they have been years in acquiring.

But the trains are running and they will continue to run.

Public sympathy is always with the working man, but when a single workman or a group of workmen aggregating hundreds of thousands align themselves with a leadership that attempts by threat to intimidate courts and set aside by might decisions of regulatory and judicial bodies, they lose public sympathy which otherwise would be theirs.

As a result of the war we adopted a policy of public regulation of railroad wages. As long as wages were going up everything was fine, but it has been another story when regulation took a downward trend.

The agitator says the cost of living has not been reduced. Facts and figures disprove this statement.

Let any man go into a grocery store and compare the price of food with the price quoted two years ago—eggs, butter, flour, rice, bacon, vegetables. The same holds good with the price of shoes, the price of a suit of clothes, the price of an automobile, the price of tires, the price of lumber, and in fact the price of any basic commodity.

In the face of very substantial reductions in the cost of what we eat and wear, railroad labor leaders deny that there is sufficient grounds for wage reductions which have been made by the Railroad Labor Board in its effort to equalize the cost of railroad operation to meet the sweeping rate reductions which the Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered.

The present strike is against the United States government and its decision as represented in the wage reduction ordered by the Railroad Labor Board.

The public would not tolerate refusal of the railroads to accept rate reductions recently ordered. By the same token it will not tolerate an attempt of railroad labor leaders to override the decision of the Railroad Labor Board.

It is an axiom among strike leaders that no strike succeeds without force. The slightest application in the present case of the methods by which other strikes have succeeded will amount to a declaration on the part of the railway men that the laws of the country have no sovereignty and that the central government does not exist. Such a gesture is the signal of impatient civil war and must be treated accordingly.

The railroad men were ready enough to profit by the impartiality of the Railroad Labor Board when it decreed an advance in wages; they are now obliged, under the law, to acknowledge its authority when the situation has altered.—Manufacturer.

The utility companies that have profited most during the past few years have been those concerns which have had a diversification in their business. Probably the greatest strides have been in the electrical power distribution, with gas second and street railways third, say McDonnell & Co.

One of the outstanding corporations in this field is the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, and the current offering of its 8 per cent. cumulative preferred stock provides a most attractive medium for the investor.

This concern is one of the largest and most important enterprises of the kind in the United States. Its three subsidiary companies operate practically all of the electric power and light, gas and street railway business in the largest cities and more populous sections of the State of New Jersey.

Last year the electric company generated 805,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity, the gas company sold some 16,000,000 cubic feet of gas, and the railway company carried more than 348,000,000 revenue passengers.

New Jersey is preëminently a manufacturing state. Its ideal location is largely responsible for this. With deep-water frontage on both sides and crossed by several railway trunk lines, New Jersey is in a most favorable position as regards shipping and transportation, not only to other parts of this continent, but also to any port in the world. In this business field the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey has made wonderful strides and its earnings have been very commendable.

The balance available for dividends for the year ended April 30, 1922, is 3.1 times the present annual requirement of the preferred stock. This compares with the amount earned on the 8 per cent. cumulative preferred previously outstanding of $34.40 a share in the calendar year of 1921, $26 a share in 1920 and $14.40 a share in 1919.

In addition to the excellent earnings applicable to this issue, the preferred stock is followed by $30,000,000 par value of common stock. All of the said common stock was issued at par and since 1908, dividends have been paid each year on the common stock outstanding at the rate of not less than $4 a share, present rate being $6 a share.

We offer and recommend for purchase this preferred stock at the market to yield over 7.5 per cent.

One of the most attractive features from the investor's standpoint is that application will be made to list the stock on the New York Stock Exchange, thereby providing an active and ready market for this security.

This cumulative 8 per cent. preferred issue is entirely out of line with the price of other high-grade preferred stocks, many of which are selling on the Stock Exchange ten to fifteen points higher and yielding from 1 per cent. to 1½ per cent. less.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are members of a syndicate offering a new issue of $12,500,000 Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company fifteen-year 7½ per cent. sinking fund convertible gold bonds, Series "A," due July 1, 1937. Price 98 and interest to yield 7½ per cent. The company was incorporated in 1895 and is one of the largest manufacturers and dealers in its lines, being engaged directly or through subsidiaries in the manufacture of fertilizers, sulphuric acid, cottonseed products and edible oil products and the mining of phosphate rock.

The consolidated net earnings for sixteen years, after absorbing inventory adjustments in 1921, averaged approximately $4,404,220 per annum, or almost three times the average

Consolidated net assets, together with net proceeds of present financing, as planned, are conservatively valued at $82,000,000; the consolidated net quick assets alone on this basis are approximately $32,000,000.

The sinking fund, payable semi-annually, commencing April 1, 1923, is to be sufficient to retire annually 2 per cent. of total issue from April 1, 1923, to October 1, 1927, inclusive, and 3 per cent. per annum thereafter up to April 1, 1937. Credit is to be allowed the sinking fund on account of bonds converted into common stock. The stockholders recently authorized the change of the present outstanding 279,844 shares of common stock into 279,844 voting shares no par value common stock and 69,961 non-voting shares no par value Class "B" common stock.

The bonds are to bear stock purchase warrants entitling the holder to purchase at $35 per share up to July 1, 1924, inclusive, the said voting no par value common stock at the rate of two and six-sevenths shares for each $100 principal amount of bonds; the bonds are to be convertible after July 1, 1924 (if accompanied by said purchase warrants), into said voting common stock at $35 per share.

Thoughtful persons have been for some time sounding the warning that when a revival of business came the railroads would lack the facilities to deal with it, and that the country had a more vital interest in the development of railroad capacity than in the repeal of the Cummins-Esch law, which is agitated in some quarters, or even the reduction of railroad rates. The companies have been struggling under most unfavorable conditions, with inadequate earnings and a high money market, to make such provisions as were within their power for increasing traffic, but they have had little encouragement from the public, says the National City Bank of New York.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

of the Chicago & Great Western Railway Company, and chairman of the Western Committee on Public Relations, Association of Railway Executives:

"How many persons realize that were it not for the coal strike the railroads would now be handling an amount of traffic almost unprecedented at this time of year? How many know that for thirty to sixty days previous to the forthcoming rate reductions, business has been moving in a volume larger than for any year except 1920? Do you realize how deeply this should impress every man here, indeed, every man in America? Do you know that in the week ended May 27th the car loadings, exclusive of coal, amounted to 821,000 cars, compared with 795,000, which included coal, in the same period of 1921, when more than twice as much coal was moving as is now?"

"It seems incomprehensible that a country like this should so persistently refuse to face the real issue; that the great question before us today is not railroad rates, nor railroad wages, but adequate transportation facilities.

"The situation with respect to freight cars is really alarming. The ordinary record for bad order cars previous to the period of government operation was about 5 per cent. Today the railroads report nearly 15 per cent. of their cars in bad order. The actual number of these bad order cars May 1st was 327,704, three times the pre-war record. The latest reports show 25.1 per cent. of the locomotives are in bad order, as compared with about 10 per cent. previous to government operation of the roads."

Mr. Eugene McAuliffe, president of the Union Colliery Company of St. Louis, in an address before the May meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, pointed out the grave danger of congestion upon the railroads at the end of the strike. Referring to the situation in 1920, when the exhaustion of reserves resulting from the miners' strike of 1919, followed by the "outlaw" strike of switchmen, forced the spot price of mine-run coal to $9 per ton at the mines, 725 per cent. of the price in 1914, he said that the deficiency of transportation service was just enough to keep the buying public in a panic, and added:

"It is a recognized fact that with the restoration of industrial activity the transportation resources of the country will prove, in the near future, even more inadequate than they did in the past. The growth of the railroad machine has not kept pace with our rise in population and industrial life; for example, between the years 1911 and 1920 the number of freight cars owned and in service increased 6.7 per cent.; the freight-carrying capacity, due to the purchase of large equipment, showing an increase of 18.2 per cent.; the net tons carried one mile, however, increased 62.4 per cent. Where the railroads between 1870 and 1918, forty-eight years, constructed approximately 3200 miles of new track annually, but 414 miles was constructed in 1920, and 642 miles in 1921, and while the number of freight cars purchased between 1901 and 1920 averaged 150,252 annually, the total cars purchased by the railroads in 1921, including those bought by private car lines and industries, totaled but 23,346; it is these limitations that attach to the transportation machine that will demand a settlement of the existing coal labor deadlock."

One's first impression of Elsie Singmaster's "Bennett Malin" is of short declarative sentences, hundreds of them, seriatim; one's second impression, that of a powerful theme; and finally, that of a book that might have been tremendous. It is obvious that Miss Singmaster worships simplicity, and simplicity is certainly a very good thing and very much better than grandiloquence. But though we admire her for eschewing so severely the grand style, which so few can handle and which perhaps ought never to be handled at all, still, there is a golden mean. And though a certain fine tonality can be got by precise strokes and no unnecessary ones—and is got in "Bennett Malin"—still, even simplicity can be over-emphasized and sometimes is in this really extraordinary novel. And Miss Singmaster's new book is so, not because it is reminiscent of Hawthorne and Jane Austen, but primarily because it has a new plot. Nothing is so rare as plot novelty. In fact there is no such thing as a new plot, but the effect is sometimes achieved as here by a fresh theme. Presumably there are an infinite number of themes at large in the universe, for which phenomenon all novelists, not to mention novel readers, should be duly thankful. The latter might be, if the former more frequently availed themselves, and in the present case should offer a vote of thanks to Miss Singmaster for offering them fresh sustenance.

Briefly, the theme of "Bennett Malin" is the effect of an hereditary itch to write on a particularly vainglorious egoist. So true does our author's coin ring, so little has it of the factitious quality of synthetic metal, one concludes that not only is her story unique, but actual. Almost any one might have been struck with the idea, but if he had mathematically worked it out almost no one would have arrived at the vraisemblance that distinguishes "Bennett Malin" from all the recent novels that we have read. Comparisons are odious and in art futile. But for the ring of reality and the effect of having been starkly lifted from life with no heightening of lights nor deepening of shadows, "Bennett Malin" seems to me unique.

As for its literary significance, it is certainly important, but it might have been so very much more so. However, if it had been cast in more orthodox molds it would probably have forfeited some of its air of actuality. As it stands it rather reminds one of a notebook of some such giant as Turgenieff, later to be transmuted into a truly great novel. It has the makings. Not that it is crude or unfinished, but neither are Turgenieff's notebooks. It is simply verbatim report. If the author had taken these conscientious and somewhat laborious annals and had fused them in the white heat of a rapid rewriting, "Bennett Malin" (Houghton Mifflin; $2) might have been the great American novel. Sincerity alone is not sufficient for great art. It is essential, but so is form. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

William Butler Yeats is writing his memoirs and has chosen as a title, "The Trembling of the Veil."

Harper & Brothers report that the ex-Kaiser's memoirs, which they will bring out some time in November, are even more sensational than newspaper reports stated.

Lady Frazer has translated a section of her husband's famous "The Golden Bough" into French.

Thomas Hardy's "Late Lyrics and Earlier" is among the season's best sellers, having already sold 5000 copies.

Rudyard Kipling is said to be the most even-selling writer of our times. His best selling books, however, are probably "Barrack-Room Ballads," "The Jungle Books," "Kim," and "Plain Tales from the Hills."

The Duttons announce the second volume of Baroness Leonie Aminoff's Torchlight Series of Napoleonic romances. The forthcoming volume, to be called "Love," is a sequel to "Revolution."

Robert W. Service, whose vigorous verse won for him the title of the Canadian Kipling, has written a novel called "The Spell of the Yukon," which will be published in the autumn.

A Japanese edition of the justly celebrated "Outline of Science" is in preparation, a Swedish edition has been arranged for, and a French issue of the book is expected soon.

Another collection of Stevenson's juvenile writing has been discovered. Mr. Gorse has pronounced "Monmouth," one of R. L. S.'s youthful attempts at a play, as absurd and crude, and further states that it certainly ought not to be published.

The woman correspondent of the London Daily Mail is a peeress in her own right, the Baroness Clifton of Leighton Bromswold. Baroness Clifton succeeded her father, the seventeenth Baron Clifton, before she was a year old.

Carl Van Doren's latest book, "Contemporary American Novelists," presents a critical survey of modern American fiction from 1900 to 1920, and covers the work of every one that has written anything of consequence in that period. John Macy calls it "an analysis of contemporary American civilization."

News comes from Joseph Conrad's home near Canterbury that he is writing a new volume of short stories. They will include beside the title story, "The Rover," which concerns the blockade of Toulon, "The Warrior's Soul," "Prince Romaine," and "The Tale."

A second volume in Elie Faure's "History of Art" is announced by the Harpers for publication August 1st. In "Medieval Art" M. Faure deals with the art of India, China, Japan, the Tropics, Byzantium, Islam, and he sets forth, with masterly analysis, a fine conception of European medieval art with reference to the Gothic, Christianity, the Commune, the Spread of the French Idea, and the Mission of Francis of Assisi. The first volume, "Ancient Art," has been received with great enthusiasm in both England and America. Walter Pach has translated both volumes from the French.

As is well known, the late William De Morgan turned to novel writing towards the end of his long and varied career. "Joseph Vance," his first novel, written at sixty-seven, was rejected by many publishers, chiefly because of the huge dimensions of the manuscript. DeMorgan's method was to write a few words on each page, with the result that publishers were unwilling to explore its great bulk. Messrs. Heinemann finally published "Joseph Vance" with such success that its rejectors wished they had had more courage.

It is generally known that Dumas had a collaborator in the writing of "The Three Musketeers," "Twenty Years After," "Monte Cristo" and other romances. The collaborator, whose name was Maquet, agreed that his name should never appear on the novels, when he sold his rights for 145,200 francs, payable over eleven years by monthly installments of 1100 francs, most of which, incidentally, he never received. The French courts have recently ordered that his heirs shall receive their share of the royalties earned since 1908.

"Reconstruction in France," by William MacDonald, which was published by Macmillan on June 27, is a comprehensive survey of the unparalleled work which France has undertaken in the restoration of its invaded departments. Mr. MacDonald has spent most of the past five years in Europe as a correspondent, and knows devastated France intimately from repeated visits both during and since the war. His book gives a full and dispassionate account of what the war did in France, of the new policy of admitting the right of citizens to be reimbursed by the state for their war losses, of the organization of reconstruction, the restoration of transport and of the mines, the revival of agriculture, the problem of finance, the work of cooperative societies, and of the philanthropy and sympathy of the many friends of France.

"Chameleon: Being the Book of My Selves," by Benjamin DeCasseres, will be published about the middle of August by Lieber & Lewis. This is a book of twenty-seven essays in contradictory moods by a lyrical satirist, nihilist and mystic. Jack London, when he read these essays in manuscript form some years ago, said they were "the poetry of utter philosophy." "Chameleon" is the second book of DeCasseres. His book of free verse, "The Shadow-Eater," published in 1915, is now out of print. Benjamin DeCasseres has fought for fifteen years to get his extraordinary books printed. He has at last found a publisher in Lieber & Lewis who promise to bring before the American public the American writer who has been called the greatest thinker, satirist, epigrammatist and prose-writer of America by Thomas Hardy, James Huneker, Remy de Gourmont, Edgar Saltus, James Branch Cabell, Edwin Markham, Don Marquis, Jules de Gaultier, Jack London, William Marion Reedy, Hudson Maxim, and Francis Grierson.

A friend of W. L. George, the English novelist and essayist, contributes to the Philadelphia Public Ledger this account of how and why Sheila Kaye-Smith came to write her novel, "Joanna Godden," which has been having a remarkable success in this country since it was brought here by the Duttons last fall: "My curiosity as to why Sheila Kaye-Smith dedicated her fine novel, 'Joanna Godden,' to W. L. George has been satisfied by no less a person than Mr. George himself. It appears that Miss Kaye-Smith and he were out walking one afternoon in the Sussex (England) lanes when they came upon a gaudy farm wagon in a field. It was painted a vivid green and touched in with stripes of gold. On the side in large gold letters was the name of a woman farmer.

Mr. George pointed at it with his cane. "There's your next novel!" he said. "The progressive woman against a background of the most pudding-headed reactionaries in all England!" Miss Kaye-Smith caught fire, and, leaving the wagon behind, the two novelists went at it hammer and tongs, suggesting, discussing, arguing and ramifying the theme from which emerged at last "Joanna."

The Page Company, of Boston, announces among its 1922 publications a new descriptive book by George Wharton James on "Utah: the Land of Blossoming Valleys." Perhaps no one is better qualified than Professor James to tell the story of this strange and romantic part of the United States. He devotes several chapters to an account of Mormonism with a sincere appreciation of the part it played in the development of the state.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Industrial and Commercial South America.

What might easily become the standard reference work on contemporary conditions in the Latin republics is "Industrial and Commercial South America," by Annie S. Peck, the lady globe-trotter and South American authority. Miss Peck's exhaustive researches on everything about South America from topography to manufactures will be indispensable to every one financially interested in the southern continent and generally useful to any one wishing to extend his knowledge concerning current economic conditions there. Doubtless most of this material could be gotten from encyclopædias and special magazine articles, but the beauty of the present volume is that everything one need know about South America can be found here readily and compactly. As general reading Miss Peck's book is rather too statistical, but it should be remembered that it is impossible to compress so much precise knowledge in one volume without reducing the text to the barest statements of fact. In fact, "Industrial and Commercial South America" is rather less decoratively written than a Baedeker guide—a point that should recommend it to the reference shelf of the busy exporter and manufacturer intent on concise and quickly acquired information.

Hay-Fever.

Sufferers from the summer plague of hay-fever or any of the kindred contagions whose origin lies in the pollen of plants will hail with joyful expectation a book that is said to outline an infallible cure. To relieve or cure hay-fever one must know its cause and nature, even as the treatment of any disease requires accurate knowledge, and heretofore the nature of hay-fever was an unknown quantity. That is until recent years, when great strides have been made in the study of pollen contagions. Dr. William C. Hollopeter has summed up the results of modern research on these diseases in "Hay-Fever: Its Prevention and Cure," of which the revised fourth edition has just been issued by Funk & Wagnalls.

The modern treatment of hay-fever is called the Immunizing Method of prevention and cure and is based on exhaustive research with pollens of various plants. Dr. Hollopeter's book is for the layman as well as the physician, and may be used with entire satisfaction by the sufferer himself. Among other features of his useful work is its treatment of preventive measures. And though the immunizing method is the feature of the book, all other successful treatments are expounded and medicines used in each treatment are named.

The Covered Wagon.

In marked contrast to the fevered fiction of the day is Emerson Hough's revivification of pioneer days, "The Covered Wagon." In fact, so used are we to the incessant sophisticated chatter of the average novel that it requires no small adjustment of attitude to loosen the tension with which we arm ourselves, as with a shock absorber, in beginning a tale of "high life" or Hollywood. Having begun Mr. Hough's book with our usual keyed-up, nothing-will-jolt us determination, we were pleasantly surprised to find it possible to relax and let ourself drift back—aided a little, it must be confessed, by the author's somewhat staid, homely style—back to the days of our faring forefathers and their leisurely if sometimes exciting lives.

"The Covered Wagon" is a love story, let us hasten to add, lest any think from the foregoing that it is merely a chronicle of frontiering. In fact, no such chronicle would be complete without more than one love story. But again so different is this romance from the triangular, polygonal, not to say polygamous, sort that we are accustomed to that it seems to merit a different generic name. Perhaps it would be better to call it an idyll. In fact, "The Covered Wagon" partakes of the nature of an epic and of an idyll without being precisely either.

Translations from the Chinese.

In an amusing little preface Christopher Morley explains how he came to write pseudo-Chinese verse. It began in the first place as a burlesque on vers libre. He says that in 1918, when he was working on the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, he used to write what he called synthetic poems. Coincident with the outburst of vers libre was a similar hysteria for poem forms derived from the Orientals, caused largely by Arthur Waley's and Miss Lowell's successful labors in translating the delicate beauty of Chinese and Japanese poetry into English idiom. Mr. Morley was inspired by the pleasant whim to burlesque both vers libre and Chinese translations. And so his own particular mandarin was born, as he says, in a roll-top desk. The present volume is more mandarin stuff.

Of special interest in view of the current campaign against narcotics and for the redemption of their users is a recent publication of Macmillan's, "Opiate Addiction," by Edward Huntington Williams, one time associate editor of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and a special lecturer on criminology at the University of California. will enlighten the general public and at the same time is a valuable handbook for professional treatment of addicts.

Yussuf Effendi.

"How do you know so much of the history of the Turks?" asked the lady of the mended glove.

"I have made a special study of your people and have written several books about them. If I can, I hope to write another."

"Really, you have written books about us? And what will prevent you from writing another?"

"It is so difficult to get at things now. Your system is all broken up, and I can not find out what has become of the fragments. Where, for instance, are the women who formed the harems of the great pashas? Now each one lives with one wife. What has become of the households of the various imperial princes? The women, let us say, of that poor crazy Crown Prince Yussuf Effendi, who killed himself a few years ago?"

I stopped short. My companion had become deathly white and swayed as if about to fall. Fearful for her, I put my arm around her.

"Yussuf Effendi was not crazy," she said after a little, in a shaking voice. "He was the kindest and gentlest of men, and if he had lived, he would be Sultan now instead of the crafty, cunning autocrat who has his place—and Turkey's fate would be different."

"I beg your pardon. I only repeated what every one here says."

"Do they all say that he was crazy and that he killed himself?"

"Yes, by opening his veins with a pair of scissors—as his father, Sultan Aziz, did."

"If he did, they made him do it."

Her lips trembled, and her eyes were full of horror, as if she beheld the ghastly scene. Then at last self-restraint utterly failed her. With her head bowed on her breast, she gave herself up to tears.

Presently, still struggling with her tears, she said, "I am one of those women over whose fate you have been wondering. I belonged to the harem of Yussuf Effendi."—From "The Lady of the Mended Glove," by Demetra Vaka, in Asia Magazine.

Calaveras 50 Years Ago and Now

As early as the 70's this city was considering the advisability of bringing its water supply under municipal ownership.

The rich possibilities of water development in the Calaveras Valley across the Bay were realized by the city's engineers, and there was talk of the city buying that property.

Nevertheless there were short-sighted critics who said that it was folly to go "so far away from San Francisco" for more water, and when Spring Valley, in 1875, acquired the first of its Calaveras holdings, these critics scoffed.

Today there would be no way of solving San Francisco's immediate water needs if it were not for this foresighted acquisition of the Calaveras lands.

Today Calaveras, which the city talked about acquiring in the 70's, is the scene of a striking coöperation between the city of San Francisco and the Spring Valley Water Company.

City and company are working together at the behest of the Railroad Commission to bring more water from Calaveras under conditions very advantageous to the city.

This work involves the company's raising of Calaveras Dam and its construction of a new conduit as far as Irvington, whence the city will build the westerly section of the Hetch Hetchy Aqueduct.

When this work, now under way, is finished, Spring Valley will pay the city for the use of the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy line, thus bringing Calaveras water to the big peninsula reservoir at Crystal Springs.

Calaveras will thus add 24 million gallons daily to our water supply, making the total 66 million gallons daily. And that will not exhaust the possibilities of Calaveras.

The critics of the 70's have been very emphatically answered.

THE NEW LOCAL THEATRE GUILD.

When the Maitland Theatre closed in San Francisco it can not be said to have released for the consideration of theatre managers a congregation of theatre-goers of any considerable magnitude. But although the theatre had its downs, it also had its ups, and there were occasions when the small auditorium was full and running over during the entire week. There were, too, groups of people who went regularly to the Maitland because they liked the line of plays produced.

I felt hopeful, therefore, that something resultant would happen after it passed away—from here, anyway. And now it begins to look as if people who have a taste for a superior, progressive, or novel line of drama are going to have an opportunity to have it gratified.

Already there has been going on for some time in Berkeley very creditable work in the production of masterpieces, of which we in San Francisco knew little, save for occasional items in the papers. I had my eyes opened when I saw what really good acting these Berkeley players were capable of, during the production of "Wild Birds" at the Players Theatre. And it is really in Berkeley that the talent, the energy, and the initiative have developed that is resulting in an enterprise which San Franciscans may profit by, if they will.

The new-born San Francisco Theatre Guild is an organization which is to be devoted to the production, not only of plays of quality, but also of lectures, concerts, and operas. The artists selected are to be fully worthy of the high aims of the managers of the Guild; so we gather from the prospectus, which lays stress on such points as ideals, artistic progress, and non-commercialism.

The theatre which is to house the new enterprise is the one formerly called the Savoy, now renamed the Plaza. It is to be under the supervision and general direction of Mr. Samuel Hume, well known for various dramatic activities, not only in Berkeley, where he has been the director of the Greek Theatre, but also for his connection with a number of dramatic movements in the East and in Detroit.

Irving Pichel, also, like Mr. Hume, a man whose artistic enthusiasm made him prominent in dramatic activities at Harvard, will, with Mr. Everett Glass, be on the staff as associate director. Mr. Pichel has had considerable experience as a lecturer, writer, actor, and stage director in the East and South. His work in "Wild Birds" demonstrated the excellence of his acting, and the association of two such earnest and enthusiastic artists as Messrs. Hume and Pichel and the strengthening of the group enterprise by the addition of Mr. Rudolph Schaeffer, who, with Mr. Norman Edwards, will be associate art director, and conduct the work in the studio and laboratory workshop of the Guild, makes us hope for very, very much better results than Mr. Arthur Maitland, working by himself, could ever hope to attain.

Mrs. Jessica Colbert, who has had considerable experience in importing musical artists to San Francisco, will handle that department of the Guild which has to do with lectures, juvenile and marionette plays, concerts and operas, and will be general business manager.

The public will have to do the rest. If there weren't so many promising theatrical organizations coming into being in the East one might be warranted in shivering with apprehension at seeing this new enterprise take shape. San Franciscans are rather an ungrateful lot to cater to theatrically unless you offer them names and reputations. We are so far from the theatrical centre where name and fame are made that local theatre-goers are always hungry for celebrities. The new organization, therefore, can not hope for a very numerous following. But certainly, in this metropolis of the Pacific Coast, there ought to be a sufficiently large number of people to constitute a sort of constant clientele. For really we are in the way of being granted an enviable opportunity to keep abreast with modern movements in the drama.

It will begin with an initial season of twelve weeks on the evening of September 27, 1922, the plays to be chosen from both American and foreign works "on a basis of dramatic value, imaginative beauty, and artistic integrity." The plays chosen for this preliminary, or trial, season—for the support of the public has to be tested—are such as have received wide comment in the Eastern press.

They include Shaw's "Heartbreak House," Milne's "The Truth About Blayds," Molnar's "Liliom," O'Neill's "The Hairy Ape," and Galsworthy's "The Skin Game."

The company of the San Francisco Guild will have for a starter a group of professional players whose standing is established, with the luster of occasional visits from distinguished players contributing to the prestige of the Guild. Lesser members of the company will be talented and brainy amateurs; who, I may add, are far more interesting dramatic timber than untalented and automatic professionals. Representative citizens who are interested in the enterprise and wish to help it along will form an advisory board.

Later it is planned to start a Guild School, which will include instruction in the various arts and crafts which contribute to the art of the theatre. From it, no doubt, the Guild will draw for its group of non-professional players.

The advisory board of representative citizens has already been formed. It includes such names as Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker, Joseph Redding, Milton Esberg, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. J. B. Casserly, Mrs. William Kent, E. J. Tobin, H. U. Brandenstein, Dr. Grant Selfridge, and twenty others of similarly progressive and intellectual tastes.

It now remains for the theatre-going element to set the seal of their approval on the enterprise. And it rather seems as if we deserve the dramatic poverty to which we are becoming habituated, which is only occasionally brightened by brief gleams of prosperity, if they do not at least give it a generous trial.

AMERICAN TYPES IN DRAMA.

The racial hatreds which have always raged in Europe, and, since the formation of new nationalities, are glowing with an especial red-hot heat and venomous fury, do not seem to afflict us here in America. We are such a blend of races that we have a steadily lessening strain of pure Americanism; the purest, coming down from the British strain in colonial times, being considerably submerged, these days, by the queer mingling of hot and cold and temperate blood currents which unite to produce the American whose doings fill the newspapers.

Yes, that is the American we all know. He and his are childishly fond of pleasure and show. They go to the movies with composite steadiness and enthusiasm, they are well-dressed, well-housed, they own a car, they blow everything into achieving the joy of life. They are so happy—or contented, anyway, happiness being a rare bird—that they don't hate anything, not even the rich. They leave that to the foreign toilers, who come over here bringing with them a well-developed, congenial aptitude for hating.

But the typical American means to get-rich-quick himself, some time, so what is the use of hating the man who has reached the summit to which he hopes to attain?

This typical American—and his sisters and his cousins and his aunts, not to mention his wife, daughter, and son—turns up with tedious frequency in the drama, pictured or otherwise, in fiction, and in the press. He is so commonplace and so common that he is not interesting.

Fortunately the young writers who are ministering to the needs of the little theatres are trying to get away from that epitome of the commonplace, the average American citizen. A playwright who writes a one-act play has more courage than those who are engaged in making a throw for success with a full-sized drama. It isn't nearly so calamitous if he fails. And so he roots around in pursuit of the novel, the bizarre, the unusual; just the sort of thing which makes the average producer experience a cold chill of disapproval.

I remember running across a character in a magazine short story once which I found extremely interesting. It was that of a college-educated Chinese who used the slangy vernacular of the American collegiate. He joshed with his American mates on equal terms, using his influence with a lot of Chinese coolies to do them some service.

Now an Oriental is never made over again inside. His external man, his dress, his expression, his tongue may all be transformed, but there is an inner region of his heart, mind, and soul that remains unaffected. He becomes a dual personality, with a capacity for widely deviating from the routine of conduct as we know and expect it when the crucial moment arrives. Such a man should make excellent material for the drama of the day, the motive being supplied by the inability of the cheerful, simple-minded, uncomplex American to realize the unplumbed depths and possibilities in that soul so foreign to his own.

"The Squaw-Man," out-dated play though it is, was an effort in the direction indicated, although dealing with the racial divergences sentimentally rather than psychologically; and the war brought to the surface glimpses of the college-educated native Indian who should supply interesting material for the drama.

There is a one-act play just out, entitled "Mirage," by George M. P. Baird, which shows the wide divergence in type between the white and the Indian. It is a love story, treated with modern subtlety, and yet poetically. It shows how differently an Anglo-Saxon—we will assume, for purposes of argument, that the white woman in the play is an Anglo-Saxon—and an Indian girl will act when the possessive instinct of love animates them.

The author shows familiarity with the symbolism and traditions of the Hopi Indian. He has achieved situation, dramatic tension, atmosphere, and more than a touch of poetic beauty in the dialogue. In fact, given suitable players, and I would like to see his play acted, more particularly as, short as it is, the characters and types are sharply differentiated.

Now this sort of thing that expresses some of the peculiar, unique, and interesting phases in the varied life lived in different corners of this vast country compounded of blended dissimilarities is far too infrequently and insufficiently portrayed in the plays put forth even by the eager, aspiring, and unsteriotyped talent that has made little theatres a well-considered feature of the theatrical landscape.

THE ORPHEUM.

Rumors have been reaching me, during rustication in the dull season, of good bills at the Orpheum; particularly those in which Kerekjarto, the remarkably gifted violinist, and John Steel, the French tenor, figured.

Therefore, by the law of reaction, this week's bill is just the usual average; containing, as often happens, on the average weeks, quite a lot of variety.

Fun and fancy are the dominant features, fancy being the attraction in "Under the Same Old Moon," with Edith Taliaferro playing the lead in a trio of playlets unreeling their stories under the benevolent regard of Luna. While little Edith's histrionic abilities are scarcely noteworthy, she travels on her cunning-little-cuteness, and has no difficulty in pleasing the public in the somewhat banal trio of playlets; which, by the way, are reinforced with melodrama and sentiment.

Grace Fisher, as the "Dresden China Prima Donna," also bands out some fancies, worked up—the Maud Mullerish one—with a pretty costume, a sweet speaking voice—as sweet as her singing one—and a more refined enunciation than we generally hear in vaudeville. She is the boss titivater, and was much prettier in her "country maid" costume, holding herself in the very correct first one, with its frosty scintillations, its feather fan, and trailing sash, rather too consciously.

Emilie Lea, aided by an efficient pair named Rock and Kaufman, won out finally, for she is a very limber and lively dancer, but she had to work for her victory. Her pianist knows how to handle his job well, I suspect, and he can turn piano notes into the ding-donging of a great bell, but he specializes on hair, and rather distracted our attention from his playing.

Still another girl figured on the bill: Beatrice Curtis, rather alluring to masculine observation, with Harry Fox, who inclines to the vulgar, but is clever at humorous suggestion; rather too deliberate, perhaps, but he gets there.

So does Billy Beard, who can't turn out darky dialect, but who has good stories and delivers them with a gusto that wins the audience, especially as he always works up to a good climax.

Other numbers were juvenile musicians who gave popular operatic airs, some clever acrobats with a heavyweight clown who had good comic stuff, and a magician who worked against a black background, accomplishing thus a number of novelties—floating figures, bodiless heads, automatically moving properties, and so on.

ROSE COGHAN.

Another old favorite, Rose Coghlan, who, happily, is still living, was recently the occasion of a reminder to the public, not of its heartlessness, but of its inevitable forgetfulness. Rose Coghlan was a sterling actress. She learned her art in London, but practiced it in America, where she was much appreciated.

Her last public appearance was in "Deburau," which Belasco produced last winter for a successful run in New York. Her misfortune was that while still in good health in other respects, Rose Coghlan suddenly lost the ability to memorize her lines.

Her need was made public by a friend, and, as a result, a benefit was tendered her in New York which brought her $10,000; not very much, but perhaps enough to give her the rest that will restore her memory.

She proposes, it seems, to write her memoirs, in which she will include interesting matter about her brother, Charles Coghlan. Rose Coghlan is seventy-two years of age. Poor soul! For her and for others like her who do not realize age and need until it is on them the outlook is always rather desperate.

Her last appearance, as I remember, in San Francisco was in "Fine Feathers," by Eugene Walters, in which she played, with that sterling ability which ever characterized her work, the part of a hearty vulgarian in a suburban neighborhood. It was superbly done, for Miss Coghlan was perfect as a comedienne, and she far outshone the younger members of the company.

Away back, before middle age had robbed her of romantic charm, she played leads; and played them with distinction and magnetic charm.

Players of her ability are not down and out, however, after youth has passed, and for a number of years now Rose Coghlan, as a comedienne, has been an ornament to the American stage.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Little Old New York," a comedy of New York life in its early days, by Rida Johnson Young, will be presented under the direction of the New York Players, Inc., at the Columbia Theatre, commencing with Monday night, July 31st.

It is a drama of youth, romance, and love in old-fashioned settings, with plenty of humor, action, and pathos to make its comedy human. The interest is sharpened by introducing well-known characters of the time—John Jacob Astor as president of the town council, Cornelius Vanderbilt as a ferryman, and Washington Irving as a young sport.

A bare-knuckle prizefight in a firehouse, interrupted by a false alarm of fire, is a humorous feature. The atmosphere of the old time is well preserved, and the dress, manners, and conversation of the belles and beaux of old New York are deftly sketched.

Isabelle Lowe and Creighton Hale head the cast. Miss Lowe was last seen here in the Klaw & Erlanger production of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." Mr. Hale has won much distinction in some of Griffith's most important productions.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Crane Wilbur has become famous as a stage star, picture star, and author, and with Suzanne Caubet, the famed French actress, he brings to the Orpheum a clever playlet, "Wright or Wrong." Mr. Wilbur and Miss Caubet have just finished an exceptional summer season in Oakland.

A male quartet is always good entertainment, but when they are wonderful comedians as well, one can be assured of a riot. Murray Kissen was last here with his "Hungarian Rhapsody" and he brings another burlesque, "The Barber of Seville." He will be remembered as one of the Avon Comedy Four.

Orpheum audiences always appreciate good music and it is for this reason that the Russian violinist, Yashoff Staffanov, is sure to be another musical sensation.

Harry Fox and charming Miss Curtis are retained for a second week. He has a lot of new comedy for the repetition of his "Interruptions."

No comment is needed on the fact that Miss Emilie Lea is the best female dancer the Orpheum has ever had. Her company and skit provide wonderful entertainment.

Fern Redmonds and H. Wells are a clever pair presenting a laughable turn entitled "The Gyp."

It takes well-trained birds to put on a bird cabaret and that is what is offered among the other acts of the week.

Cooke, Mortimer, and Harvey play a ball game in the dark and present one of the greatest novelties vaudeville has ever seen.

Many of the most distinguished modern composers, among them Stravinsky, Goossens, and Ravel, are writing special music for the piano-player.

VANITY FAIR.

A wedding occurred in London the other day at which a woman pastor, or pastorese, or ministress, officiated, to the scandal of British conservatism. There was a woman organist, and tenors and basses were excluded from the hymeneal choir. A child once asked, "Mamma, were you there when I was born?" In this case the bridegroom was present, but if they could have found any way to dispense with his presence they would have done so. He was probably very uncomfortable, and was no doubt shown his place and kept in it—the English are great at that game, and if English feminism set out to show a bridegroom his place we can safely wager that he knew it and felt it, and wished he were in some other place. As a matter of fact, bridegrooms at weddings have been diminishing in importance for several generations, until nowadays at the most fashionable affairs of the sort they attract little more attention than the hat racks they are. A bridegroom is undertaking to support and rear a family, to be responsible for a lot of harum scarum girls and boys until the girls are married and the boys in business or jail, and to pay all the bills and fines and supply all the gasoline and feathers, but on his wedding day he is treated as casually as though he had just come to take the centre aisle carpet to the cleaners. The best man does his best to look important as an assertion of the importance of his sex, but it is a rank failure. And what must it have been at this almost Adamless wedding? Needless to remark, the word "obey," that ancient imposture, was dropped altogether from the service as read by the ministress. Perhaps that was just as well, provided it does not come back on the wrong side of the contract; but we have long expected to see it there as a recognition of reality. After a few more such weddings, men will wonder more than ever why other men do it. But it will go on just the same.

It looks as though London thieves had acquired immunity in a peculiar manner, as long as they take pains to rob only the wealthy and aristocratic guests at houses where the Prince of Wales is being entertained. The other day Lady Beatty, wife of Admiral Beatty, who was Ethel Field of Chicago, lost a brooch at a ball given at Mall House by Mrs. Marshall Field in honor of Miss Gwendolyn Field. There were about 350 guests, including the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, Lord Louis Mountbatten and a lot of titled persons, with a few plain Americans to give the thing a solvent appearance. Prior to the ball, Lady Beatty gave a dinner at Hanover Lodge, Regent's Park. She then drove to the ball with the Prince of Wales in his limousine. She was wearing a white satin brocade, with Venetian lace embroideries, and just above the waist line she wore a pearl and diamond cluster brooch, a small trinket worth about $10,000—a mere trifle on Fifth Avenue, a thing Stillman's lady friend on the yacht with the golden cocktail shakers wouldn't look at, but in London quite a dazzling treasure. When Lady Beatty entered her own limousine with the admiral after the ball, the brooch was gone. Scotland Yard was notified, and sent a squad of sleuths, but by that time about 100 guests had departed. They proposed a search of the rest, and here is where the prince comes in. Lady Beatty could not hear of having the prince searched, and the others would not have tolerated any favoritism in so delicate a matter, so nobody was searched. If the thief was still there he must have smiled and thought it good insurance, and resolved to practice his gainful art only when the prince was present. Of course, the domestics have been carefully examined, but without result. There have been many complaints of similar jewel thefts of late, and it is thought specially trained thieves are mixing with the servants at exclusive social affairs and purloining valuables, perhaps with the connivance of the ladies' maids.

Mrs. James R. Mann, wife of one of the Republican leaders in Congress, has submitted a list of entries as the twenty-five greatest women in the history of the world not now living, says the Washington Post, in the contest being held to determine this question by the Women's Universal Alliance, whose international headquarters are in Washington. Mrs. Mann's list follows: Mary, mother of Jesus; Hypatia of Alexandria, Boadicea, Queen Elizabeth, Queen Victoria, Joan of Arc, Empress Eugénie, Mary Washington, Maria Mitchell, George Eliot, Harriet Beecher Stowe, George Sand, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Mme. de Staël, Susan B. Anthony, Frances Willard, Florence Nightingale, Jennie Lind, Rosa Bonheur, Angelica Kauffmann and Cecile Chaminade. Four other names of women undoubtedly great in their chosen field submitted by Mrs. Mann can not be considered, as they are now living. These are Mme. Curie, the world's greatest woman scientist; Sara Bernhardt, Evangeline Booth and Jane Addams. It was decided to restrict the contest to the names of women not now living in order to be certain as to their fame. The winner of this contest inaugurated by the Women's Universal Alliance will be given $100 in gold. All contestants must be members of the alliance and notable women as well as those of distinguished or illustrious rank will be considered as eligible for the list of twenty-five.

Miss Pauline M. Floyd, a young lawyer of Washington, has been admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States, says the August Delineator. This is the highest tribunal of the land. In all the history of this free country, the Supreme Court has been above reproach. It is the final word in the law. It is the last appeal of all the higher courts of all the states. Here the law is interpreted and confirmed. The Supreme Court is no experiment station—no training school. Those who practice there must know the law and be equipped to present their cases before the twelve judges whose profound knowledge and integrity safeguard the tenets of free men. To be admitted to practice there is to have proved worthy. Miss Floyd is the youngest lawyer at the Supreme Court bar. New York City has a woman pastor. Miss Helen Ulrich accepted a call to the Church of the Divinity. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw frequently preached in New York City, but Miss Ulrich is the first woman to become a regular pastor of a metropolitan church. The first woman to be nominated for the United States Senate is Mrs. Peter Oleson of Cloquet, Minnesota. Mrs. Oleson was one of the suffrage leaders of her state. The Democratic party has chosen her as its nominee. Whether Mrs. Oleson is elected to the Senate in November or meets defeat, she has cut the road a little wider for women in politics.

If you did not smoke, and had a perfectly good wife that did not smoke, and you sent her to the seashore for a vacation and a rest from household cares, and she returned to you with a little square flat silver case, and about her person the sour smell of cigarettes, what would you do? You would? Well, remember that women have had to stand that creosote reek from their husbands a long time, and they have stood it like soldiers. But the minute a man had it to stand he declared he wouldn't, and sued his wife for divorce. That is the Kingscote divorce case in England, and it was settled by a sort of compromise. Mr. Kingscote was a gentleman, in the English sense, and his wife had been a lady, but he set up the theory that she had ceased to be a lady when she contracted the nicotine habit. The court had no judicial opinion in the matter and called in an expert, a man that kept a tobacco shop. He testified that before a lady smoker ceased to be a lady she would have to smoke fifteen cigarettes a day. As Mrs. Kingscote smoked only fourteen, she got in under the limit, and remained a lady. As soon as Mr. Kingscote learned that she was a lady he saw his mistake. If she were a lady, why, by Jove, he would play the game out like a sport, much as he hated the smell. He had his barrister withdraw the complaint. Mrs. Kingscote will continue to burn 'em; but she will never again smell just as a lady should.

African Royalty and Paris.

As an incident in the consolidation of the French Empire in Africa, the French government has been entertaining in Paris thirty negro "kings" from the equatorial regions, says the New York Times. To gentlemen of such rustic origin Paris seems to have been an eye-opener, so much that they resented the simple arrangements made by the government for their reception.

For French officials, used to entertaining royalty of somewhat greater eminence, had provided inadequate accommodations for the African potentates. They were housed two or three in a room, and to point the indignity there was a sign over each door, "Two kings" or "Three kings," after the famous model of "40 hommes 8 chevaux."

When the kings were taken out to see the sights they were all packed into a rubberneck wagon instead of being given a limousine apiece. This sort of thing eventually got on the royal nerves, so that some of the kings revolted and set out to see Paris for themselves. In this enterprise, apparently, they had a good deal of success, Paris doing its best to give them a good time.

Which is one more token of the ease with which strangers can get used to Paris. Readers of Mr. René Maran's "veritable negro novel," "Batouala," which won the Prix Goncourt, may be surprised that the chieftains found their quarters in Paris too cramped. If the local color in that book is correct, an equatorial king who found himself in a room with no company but one or two other kings would get agoraphobia.

Relief work of the American Relief Administration in Russia "has stemmed one of the greatest catastrophes that followed the war," Secretary of Commerce Hoover, chairman, announced in a report made to President Harding. "Without it," the report said, "many millions of people would have died from starvation and millions more would have perished from consequent disorder and disease." The situation in Russia is under control, the report continued, and promises much better after the harvest, though whatever the result of the harvest it seems likely there will be sporadic hardships in some localities due to the breakdown in distribution. Through the efforts of the administration 788,878 tons of food and medicine were provided for Russians; 3,250,000 children and 5,300,000 adults were fed; and more than $59,000,000 was expended in combating the famine.

Foreshadowing the introduction of general co-education in Japan, the departments of engineering and medicine at the Kyushu Imperial University have just been opened to women students. Dr. Yoshida, president of the university, in making the announcement predicted that the day is not far removed when co-education will be adopted by all the universities in his country. Women are still barred from attendance at the Imperial University at Tokyo and at most of the other higher schools which men in Japan attend.

STORYETTES

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

When Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" was presented in New York, a Gotham woman passed a rather severe criticism on it. She said it was a very good play, all but the ending—the assassination of the hero was so improbable.

The man with the long, red nose appeared at the emergency hospital with that appendage mashed to a pink pulp. "How did this happen?" asked the surgeon. "Well, you see," said the victim, "I got a job in the shipyard, and I was down in the hold of a ship and I stuck out my nose for a little air and one of those darned riveters took it for a hot rivet."

They met and danced, and danced again, and after the eighth or ninth he asked the charmer: "Who is that Gloomy Gus over there? He's been following us around all evening, and sometimes I thought he was gathering the nerve to try to annoy you." "Oh, that?" said the charmer. "Don't bother about him. He's only the fellow that paid my way in."

"What is this Emersonian compensation we hear so much about?" asked the Inquisitive Person. "That," said the Cynical Philosopher, "is the doctrine that things are never so bad as they seem, because there are always mitigating circumstances. Compensation is the principle, active in the world, whereby you get a ride to the hospital in the ambulance that knocked you down."

There are few allusions to Moses (or Mesu) in the ancient Egyptian writings, but W. F. Durand, the civil engineer and scientist, of San Francisco and Palo Alto, on his return from Egypt laid before the San Francisco Engineers' Club some recently discovered evidence in a mummy papyrus that Moses was a poker player. A translation reads: "Mesu, I pray thee, open the pot."

Siam has electricity now and the thoughtful electric light people are doing their best. In every room in a Bangkok hotel is posted a notice in various languages. Its English version reads: "Sir—For the case that your electric light should fail, we beg to send you enclosed a postcard, which pleased send us at once when you find your light out. The company will then send you another postcard."

The new carpet in the old church was not yet paid for, and debt stared the congregation in the face. The pastor advanced to the front of the platform and with great fervor and determination announced: "We have tried every way we could think of to raise this money. We have had sociables and concerts, and we have done everything we could that was honest. Now we are going to try a bazaar."

This story was told the late Andrew D. White by the character who played Judas at Oberammergau: While he was working at his bench the door of his workshop opened and a peasant woman from the mountains came in, stood still, and gazed at him intently. On his asking her what she wanted she said: "I saw you in the play yesterday. I wished to look at you again. You look so like my husband. He is dead. He, too, was a very bad man!"

Six-year-old Dora returned unusually early from school the other day. She rang the door bell. There was no answer. She rang again, a little longer. Still there was no response. A third time she pressed the button, long and hard. Nobody came to the door, and she pressed her nose against the window pane and in a shrill voice, which caught the ears of every neighbor, called: "It's all right, mamma, I'm not the installment man."

Apropos of the death of Sir William Harcourt, who had long outlived the intense unpopularity of his early years, Sir David Hunter Blair says that at the time of his passing it seemed almost legendary to recall how three members of Parliament had once resolved to invite to dinner the individual they disliked most in the world. Covers were laid for six; but only one guest turned up—Sir William Vernon Harcourt, who had been invited by all three.

A story that harks back to the civil war concerns a troop of Confederate mountain volunteers and their colonel. They had been sent for by a certain Confederate town, but before they could arrive the Federal forces were in command of the city. The auxiliaries arrived in the night and found the town deserted. Not caring to mix unnecessarily with the Union troops, they turned around and rode out of the town by the first gate and road they found. Before them stretched a fine smooth highway and they took to it for all they were worth. They rode all night without passing any villages or signs of civilization. The countryside seemed not only deserted, but demolished as well. When the sun peeped over the Blue Ridge Mountains the colonel drew up suddenly. "What's the matter, sub?" asked his lieutenant. "Dammit, sub," roared the colonel, "we've been galloping around a race-track all night."

In the course of a lecture in the town hall at Aston-under-Lyne, England, the late Henry George put his audience in roars of laughter when he remarked: "The man who owns the lands owns the air as well. There has been only one attempt that I have ever heard of to make air separate property. Near Strasburg, in Germany, about the twelfth or thirteenth century, there was a convent of monks, who put up a windmill. One of the lords in the neighborhood—they would be called 'robbers' now—finding he could not get any tribute from them, set up a claim to the ownership of the air, and when they put up their windmill, said: 'All the wind in these parts belongs to me.' The monks sent in hot haste to the bishop, and told him of this claim. The bishop 'got up on his hind legs' and cursed in ecclesiastical language. He said the baron was a son of Belial; that he did not own the wind in that province; that all the wind that blew over it belonged to Mother Church; and that if the baron did not take back his demand for rent he would launch with bell, book, and candle the curse of Rome. Mr. Baron backed down. But if he had owned the land he would not have needed to set up a claim to the wind. Men can not breathe the air unless they have land to stand on."

The influence of Plato was at its height in 390 B. C.

THE MERRY MUZE.

Lav of the Social Diarist

Let other scribes with jeers and gibes
Pursue the good and great,
Or probe the tricks of politics,
The secretaries of State;
'Tis mine, as with a kindly care
Life's landscape I explore,
Simply to notice "Who were There,"
To mention "What they Wore."

Week in, week out, at ball or rout,
On river, lawn, or road,
In Fashion's mart I watch the smart,
The hierophants of Mode;
With zest I note Lord Gorm's frock-coat
And state with reverence due
That Lady Spink looked well in pink
Or mauve or grey or blue.

Week in, week out, with zeal devout
I find congenial themes
In dames in jade or gold-brocade
And wondrous color-schemes;
And very seldom do I shrink
From noting by the way
That Lady Spink looked well in pink
Or mauve or blue or grey.

Although the hats of Lady Ouph
Are of preposterous size,
I do not venture on reproof,
I never criticize;
No venom mingles with my ink:
I find, where'er I rove,
That Lady Spink looks well in pink
Or blue or grey or mauve.

And, if the last dead trump should sound
At some great social show,
I know I shall be faithful found
To Lady Spink and Co.;
Not musing upon Heaven or Hell,

But nothing who were
And who was drest in blue
And who in feu d'enfer.

France and the Birth Rate.

The birth rate in France is going down, says Le Matin. In order to acquaint all the nation with the gravity of the peril which menaces it and a means of overcoming it, the National Alliance for the Increase of French population, whose offices are at 10, rue Vivienne, Paris, has decided on a plan to encourage competition in the production of an article to be used as propaganda. It is desired to distribute about half a million copies of such an article, as well as to give it publicity in the newspapers, in the belief that this will have good effect in the fight against the diminution of births.

A prize of 50,000 francs will be awarded to the winner in the competition. Five prizes from 2000 to 10,000 francs and forty prizes of 1000 francs each will be given other contestants, in the order of merit. The judges will not know the names of the competitors and will, therefore, not be aware whether any article will be that of a famous historian, a village schoolmaster, a well-known writer or a simple student. Each article will be judged on its own merits.

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

HOW LONG CAN WE LIVE?

How is longevity to be attained? asks a writer in the New York Tribune. Jean Finot in the Revue Mondiale gives answer, regarding the subject from a new aspect. First of all, he says, the common notions as to the necessary brevity of life must be abandoned. Man, he insists, can live 150 years, and this in a state of health that will permit him to serve himself through all his physiological and moral faculties. He says:

"One of the principal reasons for man's death before 100 years has been the false idea that eighty or ninety years marked the extreme limit of his terrestrial life. This auto-suggestion crept like a poison into man's consciousness and made the ravages of time conform to its contents. As soon as it is replaced by the truth that we can attain the age of a century and a half—many persons proceed toward it with serenity and radiant conditions of health.

"What is more, physicians who formerly refused to treat in the usual way people who had exceeded the conventional limits of life, attributing their infirmities to quasi old age, today treat them like other patients. And they obtain unexpected results.

"Count Greppi, who died in 1920 at the age of 103, furnishes an edifying example for the centenarians of tomorrow. The former Italian ambassador and senator had until the last moment of his life kept up his physiological and intellectual forces. He, no doubt, would still be among the living had it not been for the excessive astonishment with which he was incessantly regarded on account of his old age. He was so much tormented on account of his hundred years that he ultimately was seized with anxiety and apprehensions that undermined and finally killed him."

Innumerable documents have been sent to M. Finot from all parts of the globe, enough to fill a large volume. Here is an example, in the contents of a recent letter sent to him by the eminent Chilean lawyer, M. Amando Morago Drogue, corresponding member of the Society of Comparative Legislation of Paris:

"In Temuco, where he exercises the functions of protector of the natives, there are, in a population of 40,000 souls, more than twenty persons who have reached the century-and-a-half mark.

"And the author of this document guarantees the absolute authenticity of his statements, resulting from one of the most thorough investigations."

"Since I launched the doctrine of longevity, which actually enjoys a success beyond all my hopes," says M. Finot, "others have tried to surpass my assertions. Dr. Eugene Fisk, president of the Life Extension Institute, at the annual meeting of the New York Medical Society, maintained the doctrine that it will be possible to prolong human life beyond 1900 years. He supports his assertion on the fact that we have succeeded in prolonging by 900 times the existence of certain worms; that the tortoise lives over 2000 years, and that several plants succeed in going beyond tens of centuries.

"Nothing authorizes us, it is true, to accept this doctrine, which only brings in its favor arguments that have no bearing on human physiology. Yet it must not be rejected with contempt; for, however improbable it be, this and all similar doctrines can only help the triumph of the real doctrine of normal longevity that should attain a century and a half."

The Philippines and Sea Power.

Filipinos should realize that there is no real analogy between Cuba and the Philippines, says William Howard Gardiner in the North American Review. Cuba geographically is under the very wing of the United States; and if any foreign power were to attempt her subjugation, the whole American people would rush to the aid of Cuba—and to the defense of their own immediate security. But the Philippines are very remote and many Americans, sensing possible complications, in effect ask the question: How can we withdraw from the Philippines with a show of decency and let them fend for themselves, thus saving ourselves from Far Eastern embroilments? It is rarely that the man on the street has sufficient knowledge of strategy to realize that the ultimate security of the United States depends on the security of Australasia and on the stability of the Far East and that these, in turn, depend on the security of the Philippines.

Filipinos should realize that the one and single thing that would cause the American people as a whole to come to their aid is the fact that the American flag floats over them, protecting them while their capacity for self-government is being developed. Remove the flag—as the independista would do—and the future of the Philippines will be a matter of practically no interest to the mass of Americans unconcerned with world affairs.

But perhaps the most profound factor in the future of the Philippines is the test it may put upon the moral fibre of the American people. It is no sign of a strong sense of righteousness for a guardian to grant the demand of a wayward child that he permit it forthwith to have its own way in the world. A higher sense of duty is shown by willingness to make whatever efforts and sacrifices may be required to defend and develop a dependent, however wayward. And the cycle of civilization after civilization has shown that when a once great people become so selfish and ease-loving that they lose their sense of duty to defend and foster their dependents, that is a sure index of moral turpitude which ends in their being overthrown as a nation by others who have not lost their virility. The policy of the American people toward the Philippines may indeed be the determining index of the future of the Pacific and our civilization.

Only twenty-one Italian citizens, according to tax returns, could qualify in the United States today as millionaires. On the basis of lire there are 5118 Italians who are worth more than a million, but a million lire at the present exchange amounts to only $50,000. Three-fifths of the Italian millionaires have no more than this amount, and only ninety have more than ten million lire ($500,000). Only two men possess more than fifty million lire. Rockefeller, by these figures, is thus worth at least twice as much as all the Italian millionaires put together. Two-fifths of the Italian plutocrats live in Northern Italy in the two provinces of Lombardy and Piedmont.

An interesting step towards Christian reunion has taken place in Toronto, where five Anglican clergymen and five Presbyterians have applied for ordination in both churches.

The octopus is the greatest enemy of crabs and lobsters.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Last Ride of Don Quixote.

And by his side a phantom maid
Rode a white charger, reined with gold,
Her armor like a shining blade;
And a flag floated, fold on fold,
Gold lilies that seemed to gleam and fade
And glitter like the starlight cold.

The white flag caught against a star,
Her white horse trampled the dim air,
Along the skyline, faint and far,
Legends and dreams behind her there
Streamed up to high, aerial war,
Their phantom lances glancing fair.

They gleamed and faded, and the sky
Was torn with the old, thunderous shout,
And wild with iron artillery,
Day broke, and night was put to rout,
And to that devil's battle cry
A plodding line of brown crept out,

Young soldiers from a strange new world
In whose wild mountains eagles scream,
And over far savannahs hurled,
Lonely and white, the lightnings gleam,
And round their hearts lay madness curled,
Young madness, beautiful as dream.

And lads from Oregon and Maine,
And where the brown Missouri goes,
And where the Rocky Mountains stain
The skyline with their lonely snows
Were on that melancholy plain
And in the line that bends and flows.

Out of the wild trench came the line,
Into the mud and reek and smoke,
And through Quixote's brain like wine
A sudden exultation broke,
A hope crept upward like a vine,
And in his heart a whisper spoke:

"Now is my madness truth," he said,
"And my desire and my despair!
The knighthood that I dreamed was dead,
And the far horns of faith are there,
Belief like a blown banner red,
And honor like a sword kept fair.

"My quest!" he cried, and high and keen
His heart leaped, and within his skull
The madness broke like a thin screen
From eyes of dream no longer dull.
"My quest!" he cried. "Earth has not seen Armies more mad and beautiful!"

And with a windy shout he spurred,
A phantom in that slow advance;
And no man saw him, and none heard
The cry ring o'er his cloudy lance
As a tall shadow, gray and blurred,
In crazy armor, charged for France!

Chloroform.

Over my nose and mouth a cold, hard cone
Of silvered steel, covered with white, soft wool
A vapor rolls, oily and sickening-sweet,
Heavily down my throat: a drowsy heat
Spreads thro' my limbs—Within my throbbing skull
A great Bell tolls, hollow and deep of tone—

Some one says, "Take deep breaths." The tenuous sound Seems to descend a million miles to find
My buried consciousness, but yet I hear,
And feel I must obey; though palsied fear
Grips the small cowering fragment of my mind
That 's conscious still: a mole in frozen ground.

I breathe more deeply; and the great Bell tolls
Loudly, more loudly yet—until its hum
Seems as the beating wings of some fierce gull Trapped in the bony dungeon of my skull—
Now I sink downwards—blind and chilled and numb—
Down through the Earth's damp bosom—Pallid souls

I meet, that gaze on me from age-old graves
As I pass dumbly down—At length the Bell
Softens its tone to wave-beats—And I reach
A strange-familiar, gray-green, twilight beach,
Littered with bones that yield an earthy smell,
And fringed by softly lapping, gray-green waves.
—Alan Fleming in the New Statesman.

Clouds.

Earth dies to haze below, the cables sing,
The motor drones like some gigantic fly,
A monstrous mound of vapor bathes my wing
And backward with the wind goes sweeping by;
Above the voids white crags go sharp or dim,
Oaks wave, the discs of rootless islands swim,
And arches climb and crumble in the sun
Over gray dinosaur and mastodon.

A crawling floor of color seals the spaces
Where misty islands meet and part below;
Cities that mask eternal hungering faces,
Black wood and water mingle in its flow.
Long mountain heights beneath these marching shapes,
This marble-smooth and marble-solid air,
Their manifold reality escapes
To moon-faint mottlings. Distance does not spare.

They are the clouds now. Icy-tipped I ride
A window-floor immeasurably wide
Firmer than worlds. And through its paved glass
I watch their formless, sunken shadows pass.

Eighteenth Century Ms.

The Department of Prints and Drawings at the San Francisco Museum of Art has been enriched by the gift of several original drawings by eighteenth-century French and Italian masters. A Watteau in red, black, and white chalk is one of the most interesting of the new acquisitions. The drawing, which was presented by Richard Owen, whose collection of eighteenth-century French and Italian drawings in Paris is celebrated, was originally in the famous Fleury-Herard collection. Mrs. Charles W. Clark has presented a red chalk drawing by Hubert Robert, a contemporary and disciple of Fragonard. Two examples of the Venetian school now in the San Francisco Museum of Art are drawings by Domenico and Battista Tiepolo. The wash drawing by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo is the original design for his painting, "The Adoration of the Wise Men of the East." The sepia drawing of "The Wedding Feast of Punctinello," by Battista's son Giovanni, the engraver, is the second Venetian drawing. Giovanni was the author of a series of a hundred-odd drawings depicting the life and adventures of Punctinello, a collection of hitherto unpublished drawings that were first exhibited last spring by Mr. Richard Owen in Paris.

Ever Shakespeare.

I'm afraid it is this contempt for Shakespeare, Wycherley, Congreve, Sheridan, and other masters of classic English writers that is at the bottom of it all, says a writer in London Answers. I believe that a course of the classics is absolutely necessary to the proper training of every young actor or actress.

They need not specialize in Shakespeare all their lives, but until they have realized the possibilities of stagecraft as Shakespeare realized them, they will never be more than futile mummies. They will never make their mark in dramatic history, and, personally, I think they will never fully realize any part, however small.

Give me an actor with a thorough Shakespearean experience in preference to one of the "moderns." Most of the actors of today don't act; they pose and gesture; they "mouth" lines which they do not understand; they are devoid of technique, and they make the life of a producer a burden.

Their pretended "modernism" and their alleged natural acting is a sham. It is more artificial than anything in the old school. The old actors did at least act—they would deliver lines so that they could be heard all over the theatre. Today words are mumbled. The artists do not try to understand their meaning, so how can they expect their audiences to do so?

That New Party.

The new party, according to its projectors, says the Washington Post, is to be composed of former Republicans and former Democrats in about equal numbers—voters who have tired of their old affiliations through a feeling that a new party is due and should be made as strong as possible.

Look, they exclaim, at the present situation! The Republicans, though in power by a landslide, are not redeeming their promises. They are not affording the relief the country needs.

The Democrats have no remedies—at any rate, are offering none. Beyond criticizing the opposition they seem unable to go. They are vigorous kickers, but not constructors.

So a new party, it is asserted, is necessary to satisfy both discontented Republicans and discontented Democrats, who, under the pressure of disappointment, will be able to get together on a platform and run things.

This calls for a national ticket drawn from the two old parties. Shall it be a disgruntled Republican for first place and a disgruntled Democrat for second, or the other way around? If a Republican for the first place, shall he be taken from East, or West, or middle country? If a Democrat, shall the South, as usual, be barred?

The speculation grows apace. Names are being suggested, and certain actions of certain men are referred to as evidence that those men are taking notice and consenting to the new party plans—are, indeed, counseling on the quiet and under cover as to how best to promote such a break-up of the two old parties as will supply the material for a new and compelling organization of national consequence two years hence.

Vagaries of Caste.

In the face of the debasing beggary one meets with at every turn in India, the inviolate pride of caste offers constant surprises. A man who would beg bakshish from you with whining servility would scorn to accept food polluted by your touch. He would throw it away if your shadow had contaminated it. I remember a wonderful morning at Benares when I was being rowed up and down the Ganges at that early golden hour when thousands of pilgrims from all over India crowd the steps leading down to the river, singing religious songs as they cast garlands of orange flowers out upon the breast of Mother Ganga, and descend and immerse themselves in her sacred waters. As our boat glided along close to the bank, I saw a holy man with Ganges mud smeared over his face, sitting cross-legged in a little temple and eating rice out of a brass bowl. He happened to glance up, and with an expression of startled horror seized his bowl and jumped back to the farther end of his narrow stone shelf. It was only then I noticed the shadows of the rowers and myself passing horizontally across the floor where he had been sitting. On another occasion, the very courteous English Resident of the native state of Jaipur was taking me through the Jaipur model prison. When we came to inspect the kitchen arrangements, the Indian superintendent pointed out that one end was partitioned off so that the food of the high-caste prisoners might be cooked apart from the others. Even then it had to be carried through the same court, so a man always walked ahead, sprinkling the ground with sacred Ganges water in order to insure purification.—From "Raw Material for an Indian Nation," by Gertrude Emerson, in Asia Magazine for June.

The Coal Mining Problem.

It becomes reasonably clear that the periodical strikes and lock-outs in the coal fields—including the present trouble—are due primarily to bad organization of the coal mining business. There are in the country today at least 40 per cent. more coal miners than are required to produce the normal output. The business of coal mining being seasonal in character, a measure of unemployment is inevitable. But it is plain that the situation would be vastly improved—that there would be more nearly continuous employment—if there were fewer miners. It is further true that there are too many mines under operation, since all that are now active, if operated continuously, would more than fill normal requirements. Summarized, the condition is too many mines and too many operatives.

The proper course of treatment is a more scientific organization of the coal mining business. And at this point we run up against anti-trust laws, because scientific organization means consolidation with establishment of trade agreements. It may be that only through congressional enactment, permitting a measure of reasonable monopoly of coal mining, can the desired end be attained. In a recent statement by the President to the contending forces there is found a hint to this end. President Harding proposes to refer the whole matter to a Federal commission. The suggestion falls upon reluctant ears because Federal commissions have not a high efficiency rating. But it is difficult to see how the situation can be dealt with in any other manner. The commission proposed by the President is to deal with more than the immediate disturbance; it is to go to fundamentals, to discover the reasons for the recurring and ruinous warfare in the coal fields. Because nobody sees a way for anything better it is likely that the President's plan of a commission will be accepted. The task will not be an easy one, since the commission will have two jobs on its hands: one to make a temporary adjustment to run for a year or so, another to make the studies that are necessary before a better system can be put into effect in the coal fields.

By the time the commission's report shall be ready—a year or more hence—the public should be pretty well conscious of the fact that there can be no permanent peace in the coal fields unless a kind of organization now forbidden by the anti-trust laws shall be authorized or that the government shall go into the coal mining business itself. Offhand, the first suggestion appears the more desirable from every point of view.

A Man and His Work.

From those who only a few weeks ago were still picturing President Harding as a spineless and shifty opportunist, retraction and apology are now due. It is no weakly amiable hand that during the past month has dealt with the coal miners' strike and the strike of the railroad operatives. Never in our history has a situation vital in its relations to the welfare of the country been faced with greater courage or more definite determination. There have been no fireworks, no dramatics. Quietly but firmly Mr. Harding has taken his stand upon fundamentals. With a righteous sternness he has reasserted both individual and community rights. Without straining the powers of his office, without spectacular assertion of his high obligations, he has planted the banner of Federal authority upon the firm basis of unquestionable principles. Where a timid man might have yielded under pressure (as in the case of the Adamson Act) he has stood firm. Where a vain man might have blustered, even while cringing, he has been guided by the dictates of a modest but sure mind. And as always happens when great and worthy causes are sustained with high moral determination, problems that a month ago threatened to bring about social chaos are fading away. Not yet are relations between the miners and mine-owners and between the railroad companies and their men adjusted, but there is coal for essential purposes; there will be coal for the winter. The trains are moving and they will continue to move. And for these conditions, so absolutely vital to the welfare of the country, we must thank the sound mind and the firm hand of our worthy President.

We must hark back to Grover Cleveland for an example of strength in the presidential office comparable with the immediate record. McKinley met difficulties with a suave diplomacy. Roosevelt blustered and compromised. Taft smiled his way through. Wilson yielded in the Adamson Act. It has remained for Harding, since Lincoln least pretentious and assertive of Presidents, to reassert fundamental principles and to enforce their acceptance. Not for a many a year will there be anybody to deny the obligation of government to provide "conditions under which free men, willing to work, may work in safety." Mr. Harding has settled that by a precedent that defines the duty of those that are to come after him, and which should inspire their courage. He has rescued from desuetude and given new birth of vitality to a principle all but lost under executive practice. And in doing this he has done for the country and for mankind a service of incalculable value. For in this principle—in the right of a man to earn his bread in the sweat of his face, free from hindrance—there lies that which is fundamentally related to human liberty, even to the integrity of civilization.

The secret of Mr. Harding's strength is in his conception of the duties and the obligations of the presidential office. Others in our recent experience have regarded that great post—at least have treated it in practice—as a personal possession. Mr. Harding sees it in its true character. As President, he conceives himself, not an autocrat, but a trustee. He holds himself subject to the limitations, not only of the laws, but of the moral obligations which lie upon one who administers the affairs of others. He claims no right to arbitrary judgment, no privilege that may pertain to one who acts only for himself. There is a fine inspiration in this conception. On the one hand it promotes modesty; on the other, fidelity. And here, in the spirit of modesty and in the spirit of fidelity, we have the foundation stones of the character of President Harding.

We have defined the secret of Mr. Harding's success in these immediate troubles as lying in his conception of the character of the presidential office and in his fidelity in holding himself to its obligations. But back of all—the foundation upon which all rests—is Mr. Harding's individual character. It may be true that he is not a man of supreme intellectual power or of supreme cultural equipment. He makes no pretensions to genius or to universal wisdom. And not being a genius, he is happily without the defects of genius. Genius in a man placed as is the President of the United States is more likely to be a snare than a help. It too readily invents devices leading aside from the straight and narrow path of principle and duty. Not uncommonly it plays sad tricks upon him who possesses it, decoying him to courses that would make no appeal to a man of straightforward mind. In Mr. Harding, we repeat, we have no superman, but a man of plain common sense, which, when all is said and done, is the best of all the varied forms of sense.

Mr. Harding's task in recent weeks has been a grievous one. Not since the darkest days of the civil war has any President been so under the burden of responsibilities. Besides the universal confusion following the war, besides his inheritance of problems bequeathed by the preceding administration, besides difficulties due to treason in his own party organization, there have come upon Mr. Harding a siege of troubles unprecedented in their seriousness and in their variety. Even a superman might have quailed before the problems that loomed before him a month ago. Mr. Harding makes no pretensions as a superman. His endowment is that of a plain man, profoundly sensible of his duty, a man under the inspirations of an honest mind seeking to do his work as it falls to him. No greater demand was ever made upon the intelligence, the courage, or the devotion of any President, and no President ever met a hard situation with a more manly simplicity or a firmer reliance upon the powers that lie in the eternal verities. As in these trying days Mr. Harding has had the sympathy of all intelligent and patriotic men so now he deserves the approval and the thanks of all his fellow-citizens.

Mr. Harding is sentimentally a strict constitutionalist. He would like Congress of its own initiative—off its own bat, so to speak—to do the work of legislation, leaving to the President the duty of execution—all this as the Constitution directs. This conception of the "founding fathers" was logical enough, and it worked, fairly well in the days of relatively small things. But today the constitutional scheme, strictly speaking, is practically unworkable. If the President were to keep hands off Congress there would be no legislation—or worse than none. Political and social evolution has brought about a condition in which the President must be an initiator and even a director of legislation. By no other means can the right thing—or anything—be done. Under a complex of many motives, Congress has practically abdicated one of the most important of its functions. It will not act without leadership and, we dislike to add the discreditable fact, without pressure. The plain truth is that Congress, as now organized, must both be directed and driven. Long since the country sensed the fact and by degrees it has transferred its dependence from Congress to the President. So, whether he would or no, the President must outline and, in so far as he may, enforce the course of legislation. Upon coming into the presidency Mr. Harding had hopes of reviving the constitutional tradition and of bringing Congress to a sense of its obligation. The hope was vain. Congress will not and perhaps can not do its work untutored and undirected. Mr. Harding has been compelled to assume the rôle of legislative director. It is a duty not to his taste. It puts upon him a burden he ought not to be forced to bear. Under it he becomes responsible to the country in relation to results dependent upon others than himself.

Mr. Harding's position in relation to legislation has been made difficult by failure on the part of men of his own party to cooperate with him. The Chicago convention of 1920, representing the Republican party, made certain definite pledges. It was the duty of Republicans in Congress to work with the President in performing what was promised. Both branches were under Republican control—that is, men elected as Republicans, and therefore under an implied pledge to enforce Republican policy, were in the majority. Mr. Harding had a right to expect that if Congress would not initiate legislation in line with the party pledges it would at least support measures presented by him as the official head of the party. But the record of the year shows that Congress has neither led nor followed. It is at this point that men like Senator Johnson, pretending to be Republicans, elected as Republicans, but in practice accepting no party obligation, have added vastly to the President's burdens. Hard indeed is the situation of one held accountable to the country for specific results and provided, in the view of the country, with cooperative aides, yet compelled at every turn to meet inertia, indifference, disloyalty and even traitorous opposition. Whoever would comprehend the trials under which our President has labored during the past year must understand that he has lacked support where it was due him—that men commissioned under party authority and in the party name have in multitudinous instances proved faithless.

It is truly a grievous burden, that of the executive office. In its requirements, a task adjusted originally to a limited territory and to a homogeneous people who numbered scarce three millions has grown with the progress of the country to colossal proportions. What was once simple has become complex. Where earlier Presidents had to deal with a few interests the President of today has to deal with many. Geographical expansion of the country, multiplication of its citizenship, the growth of industry and transportation—these have crowded upon the presidency an overwhelming multitude of obligations. Yet the system has not been changed; and the President is expected, even required under the earlier precedents, to perform prodigies of labor. The mere physical task is colossal. Few are the days when the President must not confer with many scores of visitors upon matters calling for understanding and judgment. The continuing sessions of Congress make a situation incessant in demands for counsel and guidance. It is a dull day when the President must not see many scores of callers entitled to be heard upon legitimate business. The mere drudgery of signing official documents—commissions and the like—takes fully two hours of the President's time each day, with grievous consumption of his physical energies. An especial abuse under which the President lives is that of receiving multitudinous visits of courtesy—or curiosity—so many that it is an exceptional day that he must not meet and shake hands with many hundreds of persons. There has grown up the habit of demanding addresses or letters from the President upon all sorts of occasions, putting him under a labor of preparation that would break down—under does break down—a man of other than iron constitution. The only time that a President may call his own is that which he spends in bed, and even his period of sleep are limited to the scantiest requirements of nature. Every waking moment is so filled with pressing duties that anything approaching mental relaxation is out of the question.

So serious have become the demands upon the presidential office that ways and means of relief must be found. The burden of signing documents must be lifted from a hand now taxed to exhaustion. There must be, if we are to have in the presidency anything approaching an unwearied and vigorous mind, changes that will put upon others a thousand time-consuming and nerve-wearing duties. A President is entitled to and ought to have expert assistants to relieve him at many points of his work. Just as great railroad and industrial executives multiply their capabilities by the employment of assistants, so should the President of the United States have expert and officially authorized aides. At least two secretaries or assistants of Cabinet rank, working under his authority and in his name, might properly be added to his immediate official family.

President Harding is an exceptionally vigorous man, as well as a man of exceptional conscientiousness with respect to his duties. He is at his desk at an hour in the morning when half the world is still in bed. He spares himself not at all, and oftentimes his day is still unfinished when half the world has gone again to its slumbers. He gives himself scant periods for physical and mental refreshment. Strong man that he is, already the burden is beginning to tell heavily upon him. No man can work as he does, anywhere from fourteen to sixteen hours a day, and permanently stand up under it. The burden is too heavy and the pace is too fast for human endurance.

Arbiter of the Drama.

Another manifestation of the tendency of industries to work as units under commissioners or general executive heads has just appeared in the field of the legitimate stage. The motion-picture industry has its Will Hays, baseball has its general interclub and inter-league umpire and dictator in Judge Landis, recently the restaurant proprietors of New York got together to appoint an "Emperor of Eats," and now the Producing Managers' Association of the theatrical world drafts Augustus Thomas and makes him executive chairman, with powers and authorities analogous to those of Landis and Hays. It looks like a contagion.

Thomas is almost if not quite the dean of the dramatic profession, a man whose life work for the theatre has given him great prestige. His personality and achievements are such that in the most jealousy-ridden of crafts he has aroused admiration without very much envy. Probably he will be trusted. As a playwright he is perhaps best remembered by that highly-colored frontier drama, "Arizona," which had tremendous popularity in the late 'nineties. It was part of a series that threatened to grow into an epidemic of "state plays," having been preceded by "Alabama" and "In Mizzoura"; but fortunately it proved to be but the third of a trilogy—a trilogy that probably did much to reveal the Americans, not only to themselves, but to their newly-acquired citizen material, in the good days before we had grown but too familiar with the words "propaganda" and "Americanization." In fact, Thomas began life as an American, and has been keeping it up since 1859, and all his experience and observation of the course of affairs since the civil war should have given him wisdom. The possibilities of the stage as an element of national life and culture are probably better appreciated in Europe than in the United States, but even here it is not hard to see the importance of the dramatic presentation of character and life, and of maintaining that force at its best and highest.

Of late, the stage has been profoundly affected by the motion pictures, so that what we might call the dramatic supply has been seriously changed, and in many places cut off entirely except in the cheap and easy form of "picturization." It is not likely that Mr. Thomas can do very much toward restoring the vanished "road," whereby many companies used to pay their way across the continent playing one-night stands, but he may in other ways do something toward rescuing the prestige of the spoken drama from the smutch put upon it by the bedroom plays that New York has had to witness in quantities for the past three or four years. People need the inspirations and the stimulus of good dramatic presentation, and have received, recently, little that was really serious and moving. The success of such a play as Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" indicates the popular hunger for things of the stage that are, to speak in a paradox, real instead of sham. They want life and its problems unfolded and a little clarified if that is possible; at least they wish its realities and its possibilities exhibited in plot and situation and with an adherence to the elements of truth that shall train and uplift the emotional nature and fortify the will. Pajama girls and bedroom blunders do not satisfy that craving, but a dramatist of the ability of Augustus Thomas will be able to discern the public hunger for the better things of the stage, and perhaps by example, precept, advice, and occasional elimination, promote some renewal of their supply.

It is said that large powers have been conferred upon him by the fifty-three producers making up the membership of the association. He has expressed his confidence that with these men the wish to do fine things in the playhouse is as strong as the wish to make money, and he declares he sees in his present relations to the stage a chance to serve a profession with which he has a life-long association and "to advance the noblest and most potent art that touches the emotions of a people." This statement, and the standing of Mr. Thomas, give promise of better things for the American theatre.

Cheap Money.

It looks as though the country were again threatened with a "cheap money" movement, drawing power this time from the standing, in the popular imagination, of Thomas A. Edison and his friend Henry Ford. Times of financial disturbance always evoke efforts to help the nation over the hard place by propagating a demand for some new sort of money which will be in greater volume, and hence easier to obtain; and every malcontent has a vision of punishment inflicted on the wicked rich through the commodity with which the wicked rich are supposed to accomplish their wickedness; and this has in it such a fascinating aspect of poetic justice that those who think themselves the victims of organized avarice can hardly be blamed for believing in it. Some time ago Mr. Ford had before the public some sort of scheme for issuing currency against nitrates, and now Mr. Edison thinks it would be helpful to have the government go into the warehouse business and issue currency against the produce of the farms and mines and perhaps other producing agencies. Because Mr. Edison is a real benefactor of the race and not a mere visionary his currency dream, backed by his prestige, has danger in it.

It is not easy for the masses of the people, and, indeed, for some clever individuals, to understand money, and its requirements if it is to be sound and capable of doing the world's work. The literature of the subject is vast, opinions on it are fanciful and chaotic. But one idea may help to clarify the situation, and that is, that inasmuch as the value of money diminishes with its quantity, there is no gain to the general welfare by increasing that quantity, since the value of the aggregate will remain about the same—whatever the advantage may be to an individual here and there during the transitional disturbance. Cheap money is a commodity subject to all the drawbacks and deficiencies associated with the adjective cheap. You may have two dollars where there was but one before, but if it takes both to do the work formerly done by the one, you have merely increased the weight, not the potency. To use a post-Volsteadian metaphor, if you take a glass of 5 per cent. beer and add a glass of water, you have only increased the volume, not the strength. And we have yet to hear of the beer drinker who would not gladly trade the two glasses of 2½ per cent. for one of 5.

When "money is scarce" it is not money that is scarce. When the Kickerbocker Trust Company closed its doors in 1907, it was immediately said that money was scarce. But there was just as much money in the country after that as before. What was scarce, woefully and suddenly scarce, was confidence. And if some one with autocratic power had abruptly doubled the currency, confidence would have been scarcer yet—scarcer than the proverbial hens' teeth, scarcer and thinner than hair on a frog. There is more money in the country now than there ever was before, and the same large proportion of it is held, in the phrase of Senator Johnson, by the "same old crowd," and they have the same reluctance to give it up, and they are not to be blamed for it. The same small proportion is held by the same people that held the smaller proportion before. Piling up the gold in the United States has not solved many social problems; nor created equality of service and reward, which seems to be the fantastic aim of our socialists and other economic reformers. As to currency, which is another thing with the same function, Russia has so much of it that you have to haul in a wheelbarrow the price of a light lunch, but it has not solved the problems of Russia. "Money" was part of the system the Bolsheviki set out to destroy, and they substituted currency in a mass, which they diluted to a thinner attenuation than Volsteadian beer. They gave it a less than homeopathic potency. They made ruble notes cheaper than wall-paper. They now have millions of rubles where they used to have one, and it takes the million, or thereabouts, to do the work of the one. But it has not made Russia happy. Much the same thing is true in Austria and in Germany. If Germany is recovering and Austria is not, it is because Germany is working frantically while Austria has been so reduced in territory and restricted in trade that work is almost a lost art; but cheap currency has not brought it back, nor is it likely to come back until money returns, in a form that is dear and hence valuable.

That Mr. Ford has succeeded in producing a cheap and serviceable automobile does not qualify him to pass upon every legal, international, sociological and economic subject under the sun. And because Mr. Edison, a better and more versatile sort of man, can make an effective electric light is no reason why he can make an effective medium of exchange for a nation.

Of course, Mr. Edison does not propose to debase the currency; merely to make more of it. But making more of it will cheapen it, and will not enable anybody to get more of it than can not get his share now. Cheap money does not mean easy money. In order to do its work, money must have value. In order to have value it must be scarce. How scarce? About as scarce as it is at present will do, although it never stays at one point for long, any more than the quantity of oats in the country does. This sounds like mere stand-patism, and it is, for that is what money needs. It has to be hard to get, in order that it may get what it should. Then when you get it, you've got it.

Johnson and the Party Plea.

Nobody need feel obligated to support Senator Johnson upon the plea of party loyalty. For Mr. Johnson belongs to no party—assuredly not the Republican party. In so far as he assumes to be a Republican it is merely assumption—a trick to win Republican votes. We pass over his record of treason in the Taft campaign of ten years ago. We pass over his record of treason six years ago in the matter of the candidacy of Mr. Hughes. But the mantle of charity may not be stretched to sufficient breadth to cover his disloyalty to the present Republican administration at Washington. He was elected as a Republican from a Republican state. It was his plain duty to support the principles enunciated by the convention at Chicago in 1920, and it was no less his duty to support the policies of President Harding in the carrying out of the party pledges.

Mr. Johnson has not done this. In truth, he has been a thorn in the side of the Harding administration from the day it took office. In the Senate he has allied himself, not with those who have sought to uphold the hands of President Harding, but with the group of recalcitrants that have missed no opportunity to annoy and thwart him. His affiliations have not been with the loyal party element, but with the La Follettes and the Borahs. Forgetting his obligations and his promises, in contempt of his plain duty, he has abandoned the party counsels and defied the party discipline by allying himself with the "blocs" that have attempted to tie the hands and weaken the spirit of the President. Most notable of all, in the supreme instance of the Four-Power Treaty, brought into being under Republican initiative and representing the highest achievement of Republican policy, he took his stand with the partisan opposition, so exercising his influence and so placing his vote as to put the treaty at hazard, to embarrass the President, and to discredit the party to which he professes allegiance. And why? The answer is not far to seek. It may be found in review of the course of his patron, Mr. Hearst, and in the interest of the New York Tammany politics which he has served under the patronage of Mr. Hearst.

California is a Republican state. Both its sentiments and its interests are bound up with the principles and policies of the Republican party. California sentiment supports President Harding with enthusiastic loyalty. It commends especially his great achievement in the Four-Power Treaty with its guarantee of peace in our Pacific world. California resents the obstructive attitude assumed by Mr. Johnson towards Mr. Harding. Here we have explanation of the fact that multitudes, hitherto friendly to Mr. Johnson and who on former occasions have given him their support, are now actively opposing his candidacy for reelection and are looking hopefully to the election of Mr. Moore. For there is no doubt as to Mr. Moore's loyalty. If elected, he will represent California as a Republican. He may be relied upon to work with the Administration, to give support in the carrying out of the policies to which the Republican party stands pledged.

Editorial Notes.

We can but suspect that between the President and the responsible heads of the railroads there is misunderstanding of terms—particularly of the meaning of the term "seniority." Railroad authorities have invited men into their service to take the place of their striking employees and have promised them continued employment. If restoring their seniority to the strikers means the throwing out of men who were brought in under promise of continued employment, then there is involved in the situation a matter of honor. Apparently, the President in his tentative terms of settlement does not interpret restoration of seniority in the meaning attached to it by the railroad managers. It is not thinkable that Mr. Harding, even for the sake of peace, would ask the railroad authorities to be false to assurances given men who have been and who are still helping them out in the present crisis.

The senatorial contest in the Republican party in California is one of the most significant political developments of recent years. Every Californian, Republican, Democrat, or Socialist, man or woman, is in some degree interested in it. Its issues are important, its strategy is interesting, its battles are news. The speeches made by the rival candidates involve considerations of moment. It is to the interest of every citizen to keep informed of the varying phases of the contest and of the treatment accorded many pressing public questions by the aspirants to the nomination; and readers of daily newspapers have a right to rely on them for information of the progress of the contest. Can a daily paper perform this function with fidelity to its subscribers if, because of a petulant animosity, it refrains from printing the name of one of the contestants, to say nothing of omitting to report his speeches? Childish though that may seem, it has a worse implication than its mere lack of dignity. It is taking the money of the subscriber for a certain service and then failing to perform it. Whatever personal grudge may animate its editor, that paper is not doing its duty by its readers, nor by the Republican party which it presumes and pretends to represent. It is like a plugged quarter—not all there.

New York is about to impose a literacy test on all voters under the new registration, beginning there on October 9th. The secretary of state has sent the city board of elections copies of 100 extracts from the state constitution, which intending voters will be required to read before they become eligible to vote. The experiment is being watched with much interest, as there are many important problems the solution of which will depend on the results. People wish to know how the selection will actually work and what are to be the administrative difficulties of its application. Under the provisions of the law, inspectors have full authority to require all new voters to prove that they can read and write English, and this means all recently naturalized citizens, those that have lately entered New York from other states, and those that have attained their majority since the last election. The law provides that an applicant may present a certificate of literacy from the head of a public school where he tries to register, or of any school in a city or town where the state department of education knows the required standards have been met. The secretary of state, who has selected the extracts from the state constitution to be used where there is no such certificate, has, it is said, endeavored to pick out passages that would convey useful information, besides testing the ability to read.

DR. PRITCHETT ON THE SENATORSHIP.

A Thoughtful Man's Reasons for Supporting Moore.

(Responding to a request that he state his reasons for his support of Mr. Moore, Dr. Henry S. Pritchett has addressed the following letter to the Santa Barbara News.)

The News has courteously asked me to state why I advocate the election of Mr. Moore, a business man, untrained in political life, in the place of Senator Johnson, an experienced politician, prominently known throughout the country.

To answer this question, even briefly, a word must be said as to the problems with which a United States senator must deal. The world today is called upon to solve problems, industrial, social, national and international, more complex and more difficult than in any previous time in its history. It requires in this work, not so much men who can talk effectively as men who can think clearly. If we are to find a way out of the difficulties which beset us it must be found, not in the midst of heated talk and by exciting the prejudices of one group against another group, and by a multiplication of laws to cure every possible human ill, but rather by clearly thinking out those fundamental solutions of human rights and of economic forces which, when solved, lead us to the right answer. Our country is unique in being governed by lawyers. In no other country do the Congress and the separate legislatures contain a majority of lawyers. Whatever advantages may lie in this situation, it is clear that serious disadvantages have come by the over-multiplication of laws and the tendency to consider public questions from the standpoint of theoretical interpretation rather than from that of practical reality. Today we need in Congress, not talkers, but thinkers who can find the right answer and make that answer evident to the people of the country.

I believe Mr. Moore's election to the United States Senate would constitute a great gain both for California and for the country, because I believe that he belongs to the group of thinking, constructive men. An engineer by profession, a business man by training, with a long experience in the administration of great affairs, he has nevertheless given himself generously and heartily to the public service with no thought of reward. His willingness to undertake the labor of this campaign is itself a generous act. His attitude toward the problems which the country faces is that of the reflective, trained, experienced thinker who seeks first to get the facts and then to follow those facts to their legitimate conclusion.

The United States Senate needs today men of this constructive and reflective type, men who have a passion for the facts first and are then willing to follow where the facts lead. Mr. Moore belongs to the type of man who would do less talking and more thinking, and it is to such men that we must look if the country is to advance intellectually, morally, and materially. We want men who think straight about our national problems, whether they be commercial, industrial, or educational, and we want men who think straight about our international relations and who are willing when the truth is known to accept it and to follow it. Such a man Mr. Moore's whole life shows him to be.

Secondly, I believe that Mr. Moore should be nominated by the Republicans of California because he is a true Republican. No democracy has been able to function except through party government. Public opinion always divides along the lines of conservative and liberal legislation. As a matter of fact, both groups are liberal, but one group desires to go faster than the other group. This is the normal division of democratic votes. Whenever members of a democracy allow themselves to be divided up into a number of warring political factions, there is no continuity of government and no responsibility for legislation. Today, in our country, it is vitally important that the historical lines of political division be preserved and that government shall not degenerate into quarrels between different factions, leading to inevitable sacrifice of the public interest. Mr. Moore is a Republican who will have his own opinion on public right and wrong, but who in the matter of general public policy will stand loyally by the President of the United States and the party which elected him.

For these two reasons—that he is a constructive thinker and a consistent Republican—Mr. Moore seems to me entitled to the votes of the people of California.

It is not possible to urge his election without some implied criticism of Senator Johnson. Such criticism does not mean any charge against the honesty and sincerity of Senator Johnson. The people who do most harm in political life are not so often those who have crooked morals, but whose thinking is crooked, and Senator Johnson seems to be in this class.

The measures which he advocates, the policies which he proposes in Congress, are, in almost all cases, destructive rather than constructive. He has great ability to tear down, but little disposition to build up. Not only has he not been constructive in legislation, but he has opposed those measures which more than any others have had the promise of constructive results. It is enough to cite two cases.

The two most important measures that have been before Congress during Senator Johnson's membership were the Esch-Cummins bill and the treaty of the Four-Power Pact, as it is called. The one was the most important effort yet made to deal with industrial problems along fair and reasonable lines. It is not perfect. It will, no doubt, need modification as time goes on, but it was a sincere and able effort to deal with this great question which affects so directly the happiness and the prosperity of our people. Senator Johnson opposed it.

The Four-Power Treaty, negotiated by President Harding and Secretary Hughes, is the most promising effort the world has seen toward a peaceful solution of the Far Eastern turmoil. It avoided entangling our government in formal alliances, but threw the moral power of the country on the side of peace and justice. Senator Johnson opposed it bitterly and voted against it.

He has never yet explained to the people of California on grounds that a reasonable man could accept why he opposed these two great constructive measures, the one dealing with our own industrial affairs and the other with our international relations. Let us assume, as we must, that the senator was sincere and honest in these votes. The inevitable conclusion to which one must come under these circumstances is that Senator Johnson doesn't think clearly enough upon great constructive measures to represent the State of California in the Congress of the United States.

I voice, I believe, the attitude of thoughtful Republicans in California in saying that they can not accept Senator Johnson's attitude toward the party to which he nominally belongs. There is such a thing as servile obedience to a party, always despicable and demoralizing. There is, however, a great distinction between that attitude and that of practical disloyalty. Senator Johnson has practically assumed that devotion to his own interests was above devotion to his party. He has allied himself, not with the President and the more thoughtful men of his own party, but with a little group of critics who oppose, and oppose in the most bitter fashion, all constructive measures. While too great subservience to party is an unworthy attitude, nevertheless the man who holds himself independent of all party duty and obligation has ceased to be a useful member of a representative body. Government in a democracy can be carried on only by some fair alignment of parties and by the acceptance of party responsibility. Today there is a disposition in our country to destroy party government by creating a series of little parties, formed by groups which have some particular interest to serve, each group clamoring for its own advantage at the expense of the public interest. Nobody desires to charge Senator Johnson with a wish to injure the public interest, and yet his practical action in disassociating himself from the party whose name he bears and allying himself with contentious and highly partisan groups, constitutes the effect of destroying the very thing for which he is supposed to stand. That he should see no inconsistency in considering himself a Republican and should at the same time expect to give no loyal support to the President, the head of the party to which he nominally belongs, is another example of that lack of clearness of thinking which has characterized all of Senator Johnson's political actions; and the main reason why some other man should be sent to the Senate in the place of Senator Johnson lies in the fact that both by his temperamental make-up and by the self-centered position which he has come to take, he no longer thinks clearly and constructively about national, international, and political causes.

The belated dedication of a monument to Dr. Elisha Kent Kane, once a famous Arctic explorer, is a reminder of an achievement quite as remarkable as anything that Kane did to add to the sum of knowledge of the polar regions. This was his mastery of physical handicaps which would have daunted ninety-nine men in a hundred. He was physically so frail that he was unable to complete his studies at college; he completed his medical education at home, became a surgeon in the navy, and while physician of the American legation at Peking began his career as an explorer which marked him for fame. It is less known than it ought to be that his polar researches, important though they were, constituted only a small part of his work. He succeeded in descending into the crater of the Taal volcano, though several able-bodied adventurers had failed, he fought Bedouins in Egypt, he crossed the island of Luzon on foot, and he made an early study of Alpine glaciers in Switzerland. All this and more he accomplished before he died at the age of thirty-seven, sustained always by unflinching pluck and by determination such as few men possess.

The first military band was heard in England in 1785. The Duke of York, son of George III, imported a band of twelve German musicians with three negroes, and established them as the band of the Coldstream Guards. Other regiments then formed bands on similar lines. The negroes continued to form part of the bands until the year 1838.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Seiko Hyodo, the first Japanese woman aviator, makes daily flights over Tokyo.

Gifford Pinchot, candidate for the governorship of Pennsylvania, is an ardent trout-fisher in his scanty leisure time.

Alvey A. Adee, Second Assistant Secretary of State, has been in the State Department for fifty-two years. He is seventy-nine years old.

Gene Sarazen, twenty-one-year-old professional, of Pittsburgh, who carried off the American Open Championship at Skokie recently, thus defeating the pick of the golfing world, was formerly a caddie.

In a recent column of "Individualities" we ran a paragraph on Lorena Trickey, the champion cowgirl. Phil Yoder is the world's champion bronco buster and steer roper. His record is twenty seconds from the whirl of the lariat to the placing of the last tie rope.

Mrs. Anna Dickie Oleson of Minnesota is the first woman to secure a nomination for the United States Senate. Mrs. Oleson has already taken part prominently in national Democratic politics. She was an associate member of the Democratic National Committee and a delegate to the Democratic convention in San Francisco in 1920.

The recently elected president of the National Education Association for the coming year is Dr. William Bishop Owen, principal of the Chicago Normal School. Dr. Owen was born in Ohio in 1866, was educated in American and foreign universities, and for many years was a professor in the University of Chicago. Dr. Owen succeeds Miss Clare Ormond Williams of Tennessee, retiring president of the association.

Lending money to kings is an experience which Mrs. Roberta Menges Corwin Hill Tearle, formerly of Brooklyn, but lately of Paris, declares is exciting, but not altogether profitable. She arrived in New York from Paris, bent on visiting the American State Department to seek aid in collecting 5,000,000 francs, which, she says, she loaned Prince William of Wied, who occupied the throne of Albania for seven months before the war.

Some of Booth Tarkington's advice to less expert writers has lately been published, along with an explanation of what he is trying to do and how he does it. "Don't worry about the plot," he says, "or your alleged 'lack of inventiveness.'" What Tarkington wants is "poignancy." "Treatment is the big show," he says. "Pick your reader—the best reader you have inside you." Further says this Old Master: "The characters make their own plot—all the plot there should be."

M. Take Jonescu, the Roumanian statesman, whose death is announced, had for a generation been one of the most prominent politicians in Roumania, and had several times held ministerial office. In December last he became premier for a brief interval. Since the Balkan wars of 1912 and 1913, when he initiated the conference which led to the treaty of Bucharest, M. Jonescu has been one of the best-known Balkan leaders in London. He ardently supported his country's entry into the great war on the side of the Allies, and latterly has been active in the formation of the Little Entente, for which he always outlined a policy in harmony with that of the Franco-British Entente.

Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas, who is regarded as the leader of the agricultural forces at Washington, is another of the many examples of a journalist turned politician. Senator Capper began life as a practical printer and became an owner of weekly and daily papers in his native state, Kansas. Besides owning the Topeka Daily Capital, he publishes a number of farm papers circulating in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and adjacent states. He is president of the board of regents of the Kansas Agricultural College; is head of the Good Roads Association of his state, and is generally typical of the new agricultural spirit of leadership. Senator Capper was governor of Kansas from 1915 to 1919, when he entered the United States Senate.

General Herbert Mayhew Lord, who has long been slated to succeed his chief, General Dawes, as director of the budget, and has finally done so, is a Republican. General Lord began life as a newspaper man, then wandered into politics, and at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war entered the army. At the beginning of the European war he held the commission of lieutenant-colonel in the Quartermaster Corps. July 15, 1919, he was made brigadier-general of the United States army. In October, 1918, he had been appointed assistant to Major-General Goethals with the title of director of finance. It was during this period that he demonstrated his great financial executive ability by services for which he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal.

Lord Shaw of Dumfermline, Scotland, one of Great Britain's most eminent jurists, has been chosen to represent his country's bar association at the San Francisco convention, to be held early this month. Lord Shaw was a close friend of Andrew Carnegie and was frequently his guest in New York and at Skibo. The distinguished lawyer will be the guest of Mr. John W. Davis, former ambassador to the Court of St. James, while he is in this country. Lord Shaw is accompanied by his daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Vaughn Thompson, whose husband, as captain of the Royal Fusiliers, was killed in Belgium early in the world war. Mrs. Thompson recently published a biography of her father, "Letters to Isabel." Lord Shaw will address the Canadian Bar Association at its September meeting in Vancouver.

Charles Ransom Miller, editor-in-chief of the New York Times since 1883, who died July 18th in his seventy-fourth year, had been in the service of the Times for more than forty-seven years. He began his newspaper career on the staff of the Springfield Republican in 1872, where he remained till '75, when he joined the Times' staff to remain the rest of his life. He was an editorial writer from 1881 to 1883, when he became editor-in-chief, a post he had held ever since. He was vice-president and director of the New York Times Company and director of the Tidewater Paper Company. Charles Ransom Miller was born in Hanover, New Hampshire, January 17, 1849. He was married in 1876 to Frances Daniels of Plainsfield, New Hampshire. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College, a chevalier of the French Legion of Honor, and a member of the Order of Leopold (Belgium).

OLD FAVORITES.

Day Is Dying.

Day is dying! Float, O song,
Down the westward river,
Requiem chanting to the Day,—
Day, the mighty Giver.

Pierced by shafts of Time he bleeds, Melted rubies sending
Through the river and the sky,
Earth and heaven blending;

All the long-drawn earthy banks
Up to cloud-land lifting;
Slow between them drifts the swan,
'Twixt two heavens drifting.

Wings half open, like a flower
Inly deeper flushing,
Neck and breast as virgin's pure,—
Virgin proudly blushing.

Day is dying! Float, O swan,
Down the ruby river;
Follow, song, in requiem
To the mighty Giver.

Villanelle.

O Singer of the field and fold,
Theocritus! Pan's pipe was thine,—
Thine was the happier Age of Gold.

For thee the scent of new-turned mould,
The beehives and the murmuring pine,
O Singer of the field and fold!

Thou sang'st the simple feasts of old,—
The beechen bowl made glad with wine:
Thine was the happier Age of Gold.

Thou bad'st the rustic loves be told,
Thou bad'st the tuneless reeds combine,
O Singer of the field and fold!

And round thee, ever laughing, rolled
The blithe and blue Sicilian brine:
Thine was the happier Age of Gold.

Alas for us! Our songs are cold;
Our Northern suns too sadly shine:—
O Singer of the field and fold,
Thine was the happier Age of Gold!
—Austin Dobson.

To a Waterfowl.

Whither, midst falling dew,
While glow the heavens with the last steps of day,
Far, through their rosy depths, dost thou pursue
Thy solitary way?

Vainly the fowler's eye
Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
As, darkly painted on the crimson sky,
Thy figure floats along.

Seek'st thou the plashy brink
Of weedy lake, or marge of river wide,
Or where the rocking billows rise and sink
On the chafed ocean-side?

There is a Power whose care
Teaches thy way along that pathless coast,—
The desert and illimitable air,—
Lone wandering, but not lost.

All day thy wings have fanned,
At that far height, the cold, thin atmosphere,
Yet stoop not, weary, to the welcome land,
Though the dark night is near.

And soon that toil shall end;
Soon shalt thou find a summer home, and rest,
And scream among thy fellows; reeds shall bend,
Soon, o'er thy sheltered nest.

Thou 'rt gone, the abyss of heaven
Hath swallowed up thy form; yet, on my heart
Deeply hath sunk the lesson thou hast given,
And shall not soon depart:

He who, from zone to zone,
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
In the long way that I must tread alone,
Will lead my steps aright.

—William Cullen Bryant.

Le Matin states that the French colonies in Africa can produce industrial alcohol in unlimited quantities, and asks why the delay in turning this into current wealth.

DAME SHIRLEY, DE LUXE.

Famous Letters, from an Eye-Witness to the Birth of California, in Beautiful Format.

Artistic book printers are rare, and those we have we should cherish, for they supply delight to bibliophiles, and bibliophiles are of the salt of the earth. We have a number of enthusiastic, conscientious craftsmen in San Francisco who will give days to the composition of a page, who understand that rubrication means red ink, who never yet split a trigraph under any temptation, and who are thoroughly familiar with the delicate differences between a cipher and a lower case o.

One of the best of them is Thomas C. Russell, of 1734 Nineteenth Avenue, who reveres the traditions of Bigelow and Wilson and the other great printers of early America, who sticks his types by hand, and who is so fastidious that after setting up his copy he kicks off the impressions on an old foot-power Gordon press, two pages to a form. He even makes his own page ornaments, and in the case of his latest work has decorated chapter heads, initials, and ends with reproductions in blue of early Gothic grillage. The results are handsome. This latest achievement consists of the letters of "Dame Shirley," and we have never before seen her in so fine a dress; and as she not only supplied material for Josiah Royce's history of California, but probably suggestions for "The Luck of Roaring Camp," and perhaps for "The Outcasts of Poker Flat," and "The Jumping Frog of Calaveras County," there is nothing, when you think of it, that is too good for a California printer to do for her.

This sprightly lady made an important contribution to California history in the twenty-three jolly letters in which she described to her home-bound Eastern sister the aspects of life in the diggings of California in 1851 and '52. The reissue of these epistles in an edition limited to 450 from the private press of Mr. Russell is, therefore, an event. The real bibliolator will welcome it. Not only is the text displayed in beautiful lining Caslon, with cool, ample margins and well composed page heads, but a synopsis precedes each letter. This is an invaluable index, for Dame Shirley is the original source book of the pioneer history of the state.

She was Mrs. Louise Amelia Knapp Smith Clappe, born in New Jersey, daughter of Moses Smith, a man of scholarly attainments, and Lois Lee Smith, a relative of Julia Ward Howe. A paper on Dame Shirley (which name she had assumed), read by her friend, Mrs. Mary Viola Tingley Lawrence, before a San Francisco literary society, precedes the letters, to inform us of her. She married Dr. Fayette Clappe, who was bilious, and had fevers, and could not seem to heal himself, and that is why an adventurous young couple that had rounded the Horn to settle in San Francisco had to seek mountain air and so betook themselves to Rich Bar, on the east branch of the north fork of the Feather River, where the altitude shortly made away with the fevers, and perhaps calomel cured the languid liver, and so we owe to bilious attacks in San Francisco some of the liveliest and most vivid pictures ever drawn of life in the California mines seventy years ago; brilliant, colorful scenes of the heterogeneous, nondescript gatherings that formed our early society and in its own rollicking spirit of adventure saw ultimately the necessities that led it to lay the deep foundations of the state. Surely few states at that time had been formed of such incoherent and amorphous elements.

Dame Shirley gave her sister this account of the formation of a typical gold camp:

During my call at the office I was introduced to one of the finders of Rich Bar,—a young Georgian,—who afterwards gave me a full description of all the facts connected with its discovery. This unfortunate had not spoken to a woman for two years, and, in the elation of his heart at the joyful event, he rushed out and invested capital in some excellent champagne, which I, on Willie's principle of "doing in Turkey as the Turks do," assisted the company in drinking to the honor of my own arrival. I mention this as an instance that nothing can be done in California without the sanctifying influence of the spirit, and it generally appears in a much more "questionable shape" than that of sparkling wine. Mr. H. informed me that on the 20th of July, 1850, it was rumored at Nelson's Creek—a mining station situated at the Middle Fork of the Feather River, about eighty miles from Marysville—that one of those vague "Somebodies," a near relation of the "They-Says," had discovered mines of a remarkable richness in a northeasterly direction, and about forty miles from the first-mentioned place. Anxious and immediate search was made for "Somebody," but, as our Western brethren say, he "wasn't there." But his absence could not deter the miners when once the golden rumor had been set afloat. A large company packed up their goods and chattels, generally consisting of a pair of blankets, a frying pan, some flour, salt pork, brandy, pickaxe and shovel, and started for the new Dorado. They "traveled, and traveled, and traveled," as we used to say in the fairy stories, for nearly a week, in every possible direction, when, one evening, weary and discouraged, about one hundred of the party found themselves at the top of that famous hill which figures so largely in my letters, whence the river can be distinctly seen. Half of the number concluded to descend the mountain that night, the remainder stopping on the summit until the next morning. On arriving at Rich Bar, part of the adventurers camped there, but many went a few miles farther down the river. The next morning, two men turned over a large stone, beneath which they found quite a sizable piece of gold. They washed a small panful of the dirt, and obtained from it two hundred and fifty-six dollars. Encouraged by this success, they commenced staking off the legal amount of ground allowed to each person for mining purposes, and, with the remainder of the party having descended the hill, before night the entire bar was "claimed." In a fortnight from that time, the two men who found the first bit of gold had taken out six thousand dollars. Two others took out thirty-three pounds of gold in eight hours, which is the best day's work that has been done on this branch of the river. . . .

From a person of her staid and Puritanical up-comings one would expect signs of feminine shock at the scenes of this wild country filled with wild men and here and there a few wild women. But though duly pious, Shirley retains a sufficiently secular viewpoint to report things as they are, and not as she might have wished them to be, and does it, withal, rather directly and masterfully, and even in spots with humor, of which she has an abundant and saving endowment. Here is her reaction, as they would call it nowadays, to some little scenes of the celebration of the Independence of Chile, at Rich Bar on the Feather:

With that affectionateness so peculiar to people when they arrive at the sentimental stage of intoxication, although it was with the greatest difficulty that he could sustain his own corporosity, he was tenderly trying to direct the zigzag footsteps of his companion, a little withered-up, weird-looking Chileño. Alas for the wickedness of human nature! The latter, whose drunkenness had taken a Byronic and misanthropical turn, retracted with the basest ingratitude these delicate attentions. Do not think that my incarnated brandy-cask was the only one of the party who did unto others as he would they should do unto him, for the entire band were officiously tendering to one another the same good-Samaritan-like assistance. I was not astonished at the Virginia-fence-like style of their marching when I heard a description of the feast of which they had partaken a few hours before. A friend of mine, who stepped into the tent where they were dining, said that the board—really, board—was arranged with a bottle of claret at each plate, and, after the cloth (metaphorically speaking, I mean, for table-linen is a mere myth in the mines) was removed, a twenty-gallon keg of brandy was placed in the centre, with quart dippers gracefully encircling it, that each one might help himself as he pleased.

Dame Shirley and her husband soon departed from Rich Bar for other diggings known as Indian Bar, where they took up their residence in the Empire Hotel. She gives us this picture of an early popular tribunal:

F. went to the Humboldt, and returned in a few minutes to tell me that I might stop weeping, for John was going to have a regular trial. The crowd was merely a miners' meeting, called by Mr. B. for the purpose of having the trial held at the Empire for the convenience of his wife, who could not walk over to Indian Bar to give her evidence in the case. However, as her deposition could easily have been taken, malicious people will say that it was for the convenience of her husband's pockets, as it was well known that at whichever house the trial took place the owner thereof would make a handsome profit from the sale of dinners, drinks, etc., to the large number of people who would congregate to witness the proceedings. Miners are proverbial for their reverence for the sex. Of course everything ought to yield where a lady is concerned, and they all very properly agreed, nem.con., to Mr. B.'s request.

The Squire consented to hold the court at Rich Bar, although many think that thereby he compromised his judicial dignity, as his office is on Indian Bar. I must confess I see not how he could have done otherwise. The miners were only too ready, so much do they object to a justice of the peace, to take the case entirely out of his hands if their wishes were not complied with, which, to confess the truth, they did, even after all his concessions, though they pretended to keep up a sort of mock respect for his office.

Everybody went to Rich Bar. No one remained to protect the calico shanties, the rag huts, and the log cabins, from the much talked of Indian attack—but your humble servant and Paganini Ned.

When the people, the mighty people, had assembled at the Empire, they commenced proceedings by voting in a president and jury of their own, though they kindly consented (how very condescending!) that the Squire might play at judge by sitting at the side of their elected magistrate! This honor the Squire seemed to take as a sort of salve to his wounded dignity, and with unprecedented meekness accepted it. A young Irishman from St. Louis was appointed counsel for John, and a Dr. C. acted for the prosecution. Neither of them, however, was a lawyer.

After this it seems necessary to reassure the little sister "back East," so that she may not think California is destitute of consideration for human rights, and the reassurance is based on nothing less than the orderly procedure of our own vigilance committee, which has of late been so well set forth in Mary Floyd Williams' book on the subject. She would have no difficulty in agreeing with Dame Shirley:

You must not confound this miners' judgment with the doings of the noble Vigilance Committee of San Francisco. They are almost totally different in their organization and manner of proceeding. The Vigilance Committee had become absolutely necessary for the protection of society. It was composed of the best and wisest men in the city. They used their power with a moderation unexampled in history, and they laid it down with a calm and quiet readiness which was absolutely sublime, when they found that legal justice had again resumed that course of stern, unflinching duty which should always be its characteristic. They took ample time for a thorough investigation of all the circumstances relating to the criminals who fell into their hands, and in no case have they hung a man who had not been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt to have committed at least one robbery in which life had been endangered, if not absolutely taken.

Offenders were not always treated with fatal severity. Here we are given an insight into milder ways, and confirmation of the fact that at least a desire for justice, instead of a mere instinct of revenge, was the motive behind these summary dealings:

A few days ago we had another specimen of illegal, but in this case at least extremely equitable, justice. Five men left the river without paying their debts. A meeting of the miners was convened, and "Yank," who possesses an iron frame, the perseverance of a bulldog, and a constitution which never knew fatigue, was appointed, with another person, to go in search of the culprits and bring them back to Indian Bar. He found them a few miles from this place, and returned with them in triumph, and alone, his friend having been compelled to remain behind on account of excessive fatigue. The self-constituted court, after a fair trial, obliged the five men to settle all liabilities before they again left the river.

In fact, California was not at that time California, but a sort of composite sample of the American spirit drawn from all quarters of the country. Lynch law merely met, in a rough way, the primal need of the frontier and expressed the instinctive American feeling of private ability to deal with difficulties.

Dame Shirley had her experience of dueling, but it should be remembered that at the time of which she writes dueling was not peculiar to California—it was a general, though then dying, custom of the country, and the scene she describes might have occurred in Virginia, in Missouri, hardly perhaps in New England, but probably in New York:

I believe that I have related to you everything but the duel, and I will make the recital of this as short as possible, for I am sick of these sad subjects, and doubt not but you are the same. It took place on Tuesday morning, at eight o'clock, on Missouri Bar, when and where that same Englishman who has figured so largely in my letter shot his best friend. The duelists were surrounded by a large crowd, I have been told, foremost among which stood the committee of vigilance! The man who received his dear friend's fatal shot was one of the most quiet and peaceable citizens on the Bar. He lived about ten minutes after he was wounded. He was from Ipswich, England, and only twenty-five years old when his own high passions snatched him from life. In justice to his opponent it must be said that he would willingly have retired after the first shots had been exchanged, but poor Billy Leggett, as he was familiarly called, insisted upon having the distance between them shortened, and continuing the duel until one of them had fallen.

In spite of such serious experiences our sprightly chronicler was part of the life about her, and that is what makes her observations so vital after seventy years. She was no joy-killing prude, but lived life to the full, and this bit of satire recalls a characterization from "The Egoist": "He was a water drinker and so died young":

When we arrived at the little oak-opening described in a former letter, we were, of course, in duty bound to take a draft from the spring, which its admirers declare is the best water in all California. When it came to my turn, I complacently touched the rusty tin cup, though I never did care much for water, in the abstract, as water. Though I think it very useful to make coffee, tea, chocolate, and other good drinks, I could never detect any other flavor in it than that of cold, and have often wondered whether there was any truth in the remark of a character in some play, that, ever since the world was drowned in it, it had tasted of sinners!

I ought to say a word about the dances which we used to have in the barroom, a place so low that a very tall man could not have stood upright in it. One side was fitted up as a store, and another side with bunks for lodgers. These bunks were elegantly draped with red calico, through which we caught dim glimpses of blue blankets. If they could only have had sheets, they would have fairly been enveloped in the American colors. By the way, I wonder if there is anything national in this external passion for blue blankets and red calico. On ball-nights the bar was closed, and everything was very quiet and respectable. To be sure, there was some danger of being swept away in a flood of tobacco juice, but luckily the floor was uneven, and it lay around in puddles, which with care one could avoid, merely running the minor risk of falling prostrate upon the wet boards in the midst of a gallopade.

Of course the company was made up principally of the immigrants. Such dancing, such dressing, and such conversation, surely was never heard or seen before. The gentlemen generally were compelled to have a regular fight with their fair partners before they could drag them onto the floor. I am happy to say that almost always the stronger vessel won the day, or rather night, except in the case of certain timid youths, who, after one or two attacks, gave up the battle in despair.

I thought that I had had some experience in bad grammar since I came to California, but these good people were the first that I had ever heard use right royal we instead of us. Do not imagine that all, or even the larger part, of the company were of this description. There were many intelligent and well-bred women, whose acquaintance I made with extreme pleasure.

We do not know where Homer got the idea for the Odyssey, nor who first evolved the stock movie plot involving a man and a woman shipwrecked on a desert island, but in these letters perhaps Mark Twain first saw his great character, "The Jumping Frog of Calaveras County." At any rate, here is the frog's prototype, all innocent of his coming fame:

After reading the description of the inconveniences and discomforts which we suffered in the American Valley,—and I can assure you that I have not at all exaggerated them,—you may imagine my joy when two of our friends arrived from Indian Bar for the purpose of accompanying us home. We took two days for our return, and thus I was not at all fatigued. The weather was beautiful, our friends amusing, and F. well and happy. We stopped at night at a rancho where they had a tame frog. You can not think how comic it looked hopping about the bar, quite as much at home as a tame squirrel would have been.

It is fortunate that Dame Shirley saw the California of her day, for it swiftly passed and its unorganized forces gathered and became a state. Reverses of fortune came to her and her husband, and, luckily again, she entered the San Francisco school department, where she was an inspiration to many a talented pupil, among the rest Charles Warren Stoddard. She was a friend of Bret Harte and his family, and from her the great story teller undoubtedly obtained suggestions for many of his scenes.

Her letters were published in the Pioneer or California Monthly Magazine, beginning in the first number, for January, 1854, and ending in December, 1855. The Russell book contains a facsimile of the cover of this publication, as well as many hand-colored old prints. It is in every way a worthy exemplification of typographic art.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 29, 1922, were $126,200,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $111,300,000; an increase of $14,900,000.

"Coming events cast their shadows before them."

Wall Street had in mind that old adage when it attached so much importance to the recent sharp upward sprint in some of the old-line, standard railroad shares. And it seems quite logical to believe that a sudden forward bound of eleven points in a single day in such a stock as Louisville & Nashville, not far behind this shadow there looms a big bull market in the rails. For ammunition there are increasing earnings, prospective dividend resumption and increases, the probability of many mergers, and the settlement of wage controversies for a long time to come when the strike shall have run its course.

As was recently pointed out here, the best purchases among the railroad stocks for a long pull are the standard issues, such as Atchison, Atlantic Coast Line, Chesapeake & Ohio, Illinois Central, Louisville & Nashville, New York Central, Norfolk & Western, Southern Pacific and Union Pacific.

Three of these stocks, Atchison, Chesapeake & Ohio, and New York Central, have prospects of a higher dividend rate this year. Louisville & Nashville is profiting from the long-drawn-out coal strike through its heavy haulage of coal from non-union fields, but its earning position is quite favorable aside from this fortuitous turn of events. Illinois Central has made a remarkable gain in earning power in recent months and is an outstanding bargain. Atlantic Coast Line and Norfolk & Western have attractive merger possibilities. Southern Pacific is a good, steady earner in good and bad years, and its future holds the assurance of increasing earnings from expanding freight traffic in its southwestern territory.

Union Pacific, still selling at a price to yield slightly better than 7 per cent., is one of the outstanding bargains in the railway investment list.

If, in the second phase of the bull market of 1922, the standard railroad shares take the lead, the dealings will be following the precedent of former major upward swings in the transportation stocks. In former rail markets the standard rails have always led and unusually they have nearly completed their rise before the low-priced rails have been taken up. But it is doubtful if, with the present widespread interest in the market, the standard rails will be able to attract attention to the exclusion of such issues as Baltimore & Ohio, Kansas City Southern, Pere Marquette, Rock Island, St. Paul, St. Louis-San Francisco, and St. Louis & Southwestern.

The demand for copper continues to expand from month to month. Of particular significance is the announcement that the Copper Export Association is prepared to call for payment next month of $3,000,000 of its 1923 bond issue and $6,000,000 of its 1924 issue, both of which were based on surplus stocks of the metal held for sale abroad. The bond issue, offered in February, 1921, was originally secured by 400,000,000 pounds of copper, and of this amount only 180,000,000 pounds now remains unsold. The copper stocks, like the rails, have held very well during recent unsettled sessions. They are still cheap enough to be bought to hold for substantially higher prices, with particular emphasis on such stocks as Anaconda, Chile, Cerro de Pasco, Kennecott, Inspiration, Miami, Ray and Utah.

In the industrial group the outlook is not so clear as in the rails and the coppers. But there are certain guides to speculative operations. For instance, it is known that activity is pronounced in the automobile and iron and steel trades, while the building industry is also in the prosperity limelight.

Studebaker has held its own against the downward movement on recent days of weakness in the industrial list and actually has succeeded in reaching new high levels. In view of this action it may be confidently assumed that a dividend increase is not far off; and earnings are sufficiently large to justify a payment large enough to send the stock to considerably higher prices. Maxwell Motors is living up to earnings predictions made earlier this year, and as soon as the remainder of its notes are cleared off, dividends will in all probability be started on the "A" stock, which is entitled to 8 per cent. General Motors has definitely turned the corner; the sales of its Cadillac, Buick, and Chevrolet divisions are particularly gratifying.

In view of the expected favorable action by the government authorities with reference to the steel mergers which have for some time been hanging fire, the steel shares again appear to be a buy. Steel common, Crucible, Lackawanna, Bethlehem, Republic, and Midvale will likely have their share of attention in the fall market.

And the building boom also has, of course, a favorable bearing upon the iron and steel industry. But the stocks more particularly tied up with the building activity are such issues as National Lead, Certain-Teed Products, Allied Chemical & Dye (through its ownership of the Barrett Company), U. S. Realty & Improvement, International Cement, and American Linseed.

Other industrial stocks and specialties which appear to be headed for higher prices in the fall are Sears-Roebuck, Central Leather, American Hide & Leather preferred, Goodrich Rubber, Mullins Body, Westinghouse Electric, American Can, Endicott-Johnson, and American Cotton Oil.

The stock market during the past fortnight has displayed remarkable fortitude, even advancing in the face of many disquieting developments here and abroad, thus giving most positive proof of its strong technical position.

The decline of the German mark to a new low level of 18 per cent. of one cent, accompanied by new lows for the year in French and Belgian exchange and great weakness in foreign bonds of those countries, culminating with Germany's request for a moratorium and declaration of inability to meet future indemnity payments, has at last forced France to recognize the crisis that has been developing for many months. It is now expected that France will take a businesslike view of the matter and join with America, Britain, and the other allies in arranging a German loan, helping that country to set its financial house in order, and modifying such terms of the treaty as may prove necessary. With the horrible example of Russia at her door, the threats of a revolution in Germany are not to be regarded very seriously. Rather what might happen in the event that constructive help is not soon extended will be industrial and financial prostration, which would extend to France and the other neighboring countries, and would even have an effect on England, and, possibly, America. Throughout the weakness of marks and francs, sterling and Dutch guilders held steady and some of our own Liberty Bonds have been selling at new high prices. For the fourth time this year, the Bank of England has reduced its rediscount rate, which is indicative of the healthy financial conditions now obtaining there.

The railroad shopmen's strike is hampering transportation, but, with the firm stand taken by the government in backing up the Labor Board, is likely to be short-lived. Much the same may be said regarding the protracted coal strike, and an early solution of this difficulty may reasonably be expected. Reports from the steel trade and other industries throughout the country continue to be quite satisfactory, with no signs of any reaction in our business recovery.

The violent market decline in the stocks of Mexican oil producers caused by the reports of salt-water encroachment in the famous Toteo-Cerro Azul pool is generally felt to have been overdone, inasmuch as the pool is by no means exhausted and the companies most involved have vast acreages of oil lands elsewhere in Mexico which they are actively developing. American oils, at times, have been quite buoyant, although reductions in crude oil prices has rendered them temporarily hesitant. The equipment stocks and most other industrials have been very strong, some selling at new high prices.

It looks as if the way is being paved for an active resumption of the bull market. Some of the equipment stocks, notably American Car & Foundry, Railway Steel Spring, American Locomotive, and Baldwin; also such rails as the St. Pauls, Wheeling & Lake Erie, Baltimore & Ohio, New York Central, St. Louis & San Francisco, Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Atlantic Coast Line and Rock Island look good. Marland Oil, General Asphalt, Standard Oils of Indiana and California, Philadelphia Company and Brooklyn when accompanied by an eight-point jump in Atlantic Coast Line, and a four-point gain in Union Pacific, means something more than a temporarily excessive balance of purchasing orders, says Forbes Magazine.

In fact, the forward movement of the standard-dividend-paying rails may be set down to the quiet investment absorption that has long been coming into this group in the form of an overflow from the investment bond market. Investors feel confident, in view of the excellent showing of freight car loadings and the tendency toward improving net earnings pated in the growth. The foreign department has increased the scope of its activities and is now being enlarged to handle a still greater volume of business.

The bond department in the short space of a year's time has become an important factor in the retail distribution of bonds in California. This department will soon move into new quarters on the ground floor of the Sansome Street entrance to the bank. In addition to the complete bond department of the main bank, a bond department is maintained at each of the five branches.

Hunter, Dulin & Co. announce a new offering of $225,000 of J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., first mortgage 6½ per cent. serial gold bonds maturing from December 1, 1926 to 1936, inclusive.

The security behind these bonds consists of a first mortgage on 3750 acres of farm land, half of which is represented by the highest type of river bottom lands devoted to alfalfa and other crops, located eighteen miles east of the city of Merced along the line of the Yosemite Valley Railroad. Two independent appraisers have valued these properties at a minimum of $717,800, which is more than three times the amount of the bond issue. The net earnings of this company for the past three years has averaged more than one and three-quarters times bond interest requirements. Application has been made to certify these bonds as a legal investment for California savings banks and they are being offered at 98½, yielding from 6.90 per cent. to 6.60 per cent. according to maturity.

If the so-called "California Water and Power Act" comes into force, as a result of the November vote, the taxpayers will be saddled with a loss at once of over $8,000,000, the amount now raised on taxable property which will pay no taxes when acquired by the five supermen who will be managing the development of the hydro-electric power of the state. The public utility companies now pay a sum approaching this in taxes. That will be lost, and the ordinary taxpayer will have to make up the loss. This is the first loss, a loss that is certain, say Strassburger & Co. If, as is probable, a rate for power below cost is charged to large industrial plants, the ordinary taxpayer will have to make up the deficiency. This is now happening in Los Angeles.

If the Big Five should find—as they are finding in Ontario—that they have bitten off more than they can chew, that they have, "lured on by ambition, fallen into a pit of their own digging," and that they are compelled, at a heavy loss, to fall back on private companies to enable them to supply the power required, all of us will, as taxpayers, have to contribute our quota to pull them out of the pit.

This is without taking into account the certainty that their management will be, as public management has always been, amateurish and wasteful, because friendship, rather than efficiency, has been the determining factor in the selection of officials.

We have also to assume that no political machine will be created, that every servant of "The Five" will place the public interest before that of the individual on whose favor his all depends—too much to expect of the average man.

A democracy deserves every ill from which it suffers, for those who administer its affairs are of its own choosing. The defeat of the "California Water and Power Act" is certain if every taxpayer will take the trouble to study the text himself, instead of accepting the promoters' slogans at face value. If the act goes through, the taxpayers will have only themselves to blame when they find the burden of taxation too heavy to be borne.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company announce a new issue of $3,500,000 Holly Sugar Corporation first mortgage fifteen-year 7 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, due July 1, 1937.

Holly Sugar Corporation is one of the large beet-sugar companies of the United States, and as successor to the Holly Sugar Company has been in successful operation since 1905. It owns or controls through subsidiaries seven modern fully equipped sugar mills located in the states of California, Colorado, and Wyoming, with a present annual output of approximately 1,000,000 bags of refined sugar. The management of the company has been nationally recognized as of the best.

These bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the physical properties of the Holly Sugar Corporation now owned or hereafter acquired, and constitute its only funded debt. They are additionally secured by deposit of all stocks of subsidiary companies owned by the Holly Sugar Corporation. No mortgage can be placed on the properties of these subsidiaries while any part of this issue is outstanding.

Conditions at the close of the first half of 1922 indicate that business will expand moderately during the autumn and winter months. It is now one year since the definite beginning of recovery from the depression of 1920-21. Progress was slow until the close of 1921, but since the beginning of 1922 improvement has been rapid. Money is cheap. The crop outlook is excellent. With few exceptions, stocks of raw materials and of manufactured products are not larger than necessary to bridge the normal period be-is the deficit to be made up? Will the burden be shifted to the individual taxpayer, or will fares be raised to the point where expenses can be met? If the lines are not paying their way at present, they certainly can not do it when permanent repair of tracks starts. Work being done on tracks at present is of temporary nature."

The Anglo-California Trust Company's resources gained $8,641,694 during the twelve months ended June 30, 1922, according to an announcement made by President Mortimer tween production and consumption. Commodity prices are rising. The movement at present seems to be primarily one of adjustment between the different classes of commodities, and as long as the upward tendency does not assume a speculative character, it is a favorable factor. Except for strikes, there is little idleness. Production has expanded steadily since the beginning of the year, and as yet the usual midsummer dullness has been little felt, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York.

Any fair appraisal of the situation must, however, take cognizance of several groups of qualifying factors. First and most important of these is the position of domestic consumers. Many are cautious and disposed to economize. Buying is not likely to be stimulated by report of impending shortage of goods, or fears of higher prices, for except in the case of necessities the public is will-wait, or to do without, if prices show a tendency to soar. Furthermore, large sections of the population can not buy, no matter how willing, if prices rise too rapidly. Although they have recovered somewhat, wages and salaries are lower than two years ago. Enforced unemployment left many workers in debt, or with depleted savings, not yet made good. Strikes have kept hundreds of thousands in idleness for months and threaten to result in idleness for other thousands if not speedily brought to an end. Farmers are usually conservative buyers and although prices of farm products have improved, prices of what farmers must buy are still too high in relation to what they have to sell to place them in a position to expand their purchases rapidly. Furthermore, they are paying their debts. There is every ground to expect a reasonable volume of fall business at moderate prices, but there is no basis for expectation of such volume at high prices or of boom business at any price.

The second retarding factor is the labor situation. The United States is in the midst of widespread labor troubles. It is useless to declaim against the spirit that has brought this situation to pass. Each side in both the railroad and coal strikes believes it is justified. Workmen do not lightly sacrifice their earning power, or corporations carelessly take the risk of damage to their property or thoughtlessly forego the hope of profits for a long period. That section of the public which is not directly concerned is an equal sufferer, for these conflicts are certain to be felt in lessened productivity and restricted distribution in every line. The only settlements which can be ultimately in the public interest are fair settlements, and the public has the right to take all measures which may serve promptly to bring them about. Delay in reaching settlements will temporarily delay expansion, but it will not affect the fundamental causes which for more than a year have been making for better business.

The third factor which seems likely to limit business expansion in the United States is the European situation. Outwardly it remains complicated. Enormous issues of paper have further depreciated the German mark. There have been assassinations and other evidences of political unrest and Germany has formally applied to the Reparations Commission for a moratorium on reparations payments. Difficulties arising from depreciated currencies and disorganized public finances are bound to be a retarding influence, and may have a certain adverse effect on exports of grains and other food products, cotton and other raw materials from the United States.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Maurice Francis Egan, scholarly diplomat, lends interest, at rather long range, to the third printing by John Murray in England of Sir Sidney Lee's life of Shakespeare. Mr. Egan was formerly minister to Denmark, and he will have it that Shakespeare must have visited that land with a troupe of players, that he knew the Danish people and their characteristics, and that Hamlet was not a mere lay figure of melancholic sensibilities, who could have worn his costume in front of any shop, but was a real Dane of the Danes, typifying their temperament and often their mental attitude. This he sets out in an article in the current Geographical Magazine. To him these things are as clear as the ramparts where Hamlet's father walked, or the pool in which Ophelia drowned herself. If you don't believe it, he can "show you the spot."

Now, whether Shakespeare ever reached Denmark or not, Sir Sidney Lee's book makes it clear that in the twenty-seven years between 1587 and 1614 he acted in thirty-three towns outside of London. In England there was a "road," even in Elizabethan times, and the theatrical companies regularly went on tour. Hence there is nothing extravagant in Mr. Egan's theory that the world's greatest genius in the field of letters saw Denmark with his own penetrating eyes, and noted there the characteristics of the Danish people. That matchless mind could not have wandered abroad without noting every salient difference between the somewhat mercurial folk among whom he was a foreigner, and the rather reserved and cool-headed English of whom he was the highest intellectual development. He might well have met two or three Hamlets. A Polonius or so would not have been out of the possibilities. As for Rosenkranz and Guildenstern, we have Mr. Egan's word for it that these are two well-known family names among the Danes. And we have the word of Paul du Chailly for it that the Danes are really the preponderating ethnic element of the English race. People may smile at Du Chailly as an ethnologist. They once smiled at him as a naturalist because he said he had found gorillas in Africa—but they got over it. If the Danes were the preponderant ethnic element in the more or less mixed English strain, it would not be stretching fancy too far to imagine Shakespeare as himself a Dane by descent, or at least largely Danish, and hence especially gifted for interpreting the Danish soul.

Whatever the English may be, whether more Scandinavian than German, or the reverse, Shakespeare was bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh. His father, John Shakespeare, was typical. He seems to have treated the town of Stratford-on-Avon like a lodge, and to have gone through all the chairs, beginning as official ale taster, accepting a promotion to be town councillor, moving up once more to the proud position of petty constable, then becoming a chamberlain and finally an alderman; above which there seem to rise no greater heights except the empyrean itself. Commercially, he was what we should call a successful business man—that is, he succeeded in being a butcher, a corn factor, a wool merchant, and a dealer in malt, skins, and leather. Such versatility must have been necessitated by the fact that there was not much money in any of these trades, so he had to double up.

As to son William, he was educated at the Edward VI Grammar School of Stratford, where he studied Latin, read Ovid, and picked up a good working knowledge of French. Sir Sidney says of him: "There is, too, no reason to doubt that the dramatist possessed sufficient acquaintance with Italian to enable him to discern the drift of an Italian poem by Ariosto or Tasso or of a novel by Boccaccio or Bandello. Hamlet knew that the story of Gonzago was 'extant and written in very choice Italian.'"

Father got too many irons in the fire, or there were not enough chairs in the lodge, so when William left school he seems to have been apprenticed to a butcher. When he was eighteen and a half years of age, his future wife's relatives appeared to think he would better be married, so he was—to a lady eight years his senior. It was 120 miles to London, but after trying married life awhile and having three children by the time he was twenty-one, he decided to walk it. He passed in by Tyburn Tree "with the adder-bitten root," and by the archway of Newgate. Says Sir Sidney: "It was there that Shakespeare caught his first glimpse of the goal of his youthful ambition"—whether Newgate goal or not he does not state.

Then began his career of holding horses, acting as call boy, and then as super, and then as an actor and playwright. Scenery may have been scanty in the reign of Elizabeth, but by the time of James the genius of Inigo Jones began to supply separate set scenes, with contrivances for shifting them. Costume was a little in advance of scenery, inasmuch as the principal characters had especial "earmarks" for well-recognized parts: the classic Greek or Roman soldier, for example, usually wore Tudor armor, the civilians doublet and hose. The supporting parts, however, came on in the ordinary costume of the day, without any particular reference to time or place. As long as the audiences would accept it, this must have been economical and convenient. However, the wardrobes grew, and often contained rich materials in the height of passing fashion. Indeed, they became splendid, and foreigners commented on the false hair and beards, crowns and mitres and croziers and shields and weapons and the like paraphernalia. Toward the close of Shakespeare's career these props became very abundant, and the historical plays were richly costumed.

Shakespeare began with "Love's Labor's Lost," probably produced when he was about twenty-eight years old. There followed "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" and "The Comedy of Errors." About these three there was, perhaps, nothing transcending the genius of other men then or thereabouts writing. But his rising sun blazed forth in inexpressible splendor with his next effort, the incomparable "Romeo and Juliet," which in time about marked the term of his youth. Its pathos, its tragedy, its quality of pure drama, exceeded anything the world had known; far exceeded the genius even of Kit Marlowe. And here we may leave him for the time—the trip to Denmark a matter of conjecture, but not his skill, authority, and power.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Rafael Sabatini, author of the popular romance of the French revolution, "Scaramouche," has written a new novel, "Captain Blood" (Houghton Mifflin Company).

"Outdoor Stories," a seasonable addition to the series of St. Nicholas stories, is announced by the Century Company. This juvenile magazine remains the classic periodical for children.

A new novel by Anthony Pryde, author of the clever novel of English life, "The Ordeal of Honor," is to be published in the fall by Dodd, Mead & Co. It is to be called "Claire de Lune."

Selma Lagerlöf has again declined to run for the Swedish Parliament. Her reason is that she is not prepared to give time and effort to politics and she does not wish to give up writing.

Edith Wharton is resting from the exertions of proof-reading her latest book, "Glimpses of the Moon" (Appleton), and is staying at Fountainbleau a short time before opening her summer home in Provence.

The Macmillan Company is reissuing several important titles that have been out of print for some time. Henry James' collection of short stories, "The Real Thing," Pierre Loti's "Disenchanted," and E. V. Lucas' "Wanderer in Paris" are among them.

The people of the United States will consume at least ten billion pounds of sugar in 1922 and statistics indicate a steady rate of increase in consumption.

Sugar is a basic commodity and any company, with low production costs, engaged in the growth and manufacture of sugar is safeguarded by a vigorous demand which persists regardless of price variations.

This fact should be considered in addition to the valuable assets of the Calamba Sugar Estate. It is one of the many factors which recommend this issue as a profitable as well as a safe investment.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Reign of Iron.

Humanity's struggle with its own machinery is the theme of Arthur Pound in "The Iron Man in Industry." How far machinery may be permitted to become the tyrant and dictator of life, the master of the soul, is a question that must appeal to every thinking person. Machinery's support of modern civilization is unquestioned. What is questioned, and rightly questioned here, is the moral value it lacks and destroys. This is a mechanical age. But that does not necessarily mean that education should be, so to speak, mechanized, and the whole outlook of man restricted to the iron material with which he toils. A modern tendency in education is to sacrifice moral and mental culture to manual dexterity in order that the graduate of the so-called vocational school may be an effective mill hand rather than a man among his fellows. Yet "practical" education fails to satisfy any respectable intellectual need. It is a fortunate thing that such a man as Arthur Pound can sense and give utterance to the danger, for it is a real one. He says:

"The duel is on between that culture of the active soul which democracy offers as a final value of life, and a mechanization of mundane affairs so complete that democracy as we know it must perish under its sway. Our successors shall not come out of this conflict spiritually victorious unless they are sustained by faith that their labors are acceptable of God. . . . An adjustment between human interests and machine interests must still be made somewhere—if not in the shop, then in the streets, homes, and legislatures. As machines come to do more of the necessary work of the world, the right use of leisure as an antidote for sloth and luxuriousness and as a means of mental, moral, and physical health becomes essential to national vigor."

THE IRON MAN IN INDUSTRY. By Arthur Pound. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly Press; $1.75.

The Exemplary Theatre

If there is any ratio between the interest shown in drama and the theatre in any age and the state of civilization of that age, ours must be destitute in culture indeed. The obverse cases of Hellenic and Elizabethan society immediately occur to one. Our own is as far removed as any era of playmaking has been. We live in the day of the well-made revue, but we are not yet so far gone but that we can welcome Mr. Harley Granville-Barker's attempt to diagnose our sad case and perhaps prescribe an antidote. Mr. Granville-Barker has thoroughly threshed out the subject in his recently published "The Exemplary Theatre," wherein he presents his own prejudices and argues for the educational importance of the playhouse. His first chapter, cast in the form of a debate between himself, the man of the theatre, and an imaginary "minister of education," is as amusing an exercise as we have recently encountered. The author has a wary eye on dramatic effect, we perceive, and knows well the importance of a good beginning. The remainder of the book is an argument for a theatrical renaissance that one altruistically hopes for the benefit of humanity at large will be generally read.

THE EXEMPLARY THEATRE. By Harley Granville-Barker. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $2.

The Glimpses of the Moon.

Since Edith Wharton is generally conceded to be our foremost living novelist, and since her work is always of the social satiric sort, it might be inferred that she and satire are typical of our national literature. Nothing, of course, could be farther from the truth; she is no more typical than her great predecessor, Henry James, was of his generation of either life or letters in America. But in the name of originality and by all the shades of plagiarism, why has Mrs. Wharton resorted to imitation of the other great American novelist? And no one can read the first sentence of "Glimpses of the Moon" without being hit between the eyes by the James mannerism, rhythm, and punctuation. Such an aberration on the part of Mrs. Wharton is all the more inexcusable since she was well equipped with a style of her own which, ardent James admirer though we are, we preferred to that of any other American novelist or to that of any other living novelist. Why any one with a style as delicately austere as Edith Wharton's or as coldly and hardly humorous should relinquish the practice of that accomplishment merely to pay the dubious compliment of simulation to another writer is one of the literary mysteries whose solution we will to the pundits and critics of a later age. We merely record the regrettable truth.

Another reviewer has called "The Glimpses of the Moon" a second "House of Mirth." It isn't—not any more than were "Summer" or "The Age of Innocence" or any of the author's other society novels. Mrs. Wharton has never done anything else so fine as "The House of Mirth," not even "The Valley of Decision," and the fact is doubly unfortunate, for in addition to the intrinsic misfortune implied in lack of progress is the underlying cause. Mrs. Wharton knew that "The House of Mirth" was very fine, and she has consciously or unconsciously been imitating it ever since. She might refute this statement by saying that her books were avowedly all social satires, but the foregoing is in our opinion the reason why she has never equaled or surpassed her own masterpiece.

If one had never read Mrs. Wharton's solitary masterpiece and had never—and here, we interpolate, a large number of people will benefit—read any of Henry James', one would think "The Glimpses of the Moon" very good indeed. It is only by the modern theory of relativity that it shrinks by contrast with greater things. And the author herself has done far better things before she fell into the too easy trap of "Jacobean" involutions. We sincerely hope that Edith Wharton will return to her own beautifully cut style and that in her next novel she will renounce the theme of "The House of Mirth," fascinating as that thesis of disenchantment was in its original exposition.

The Calaveras Water Agreement

Work now under way to increase your water supply by the addition of 24 million gallons daily from Calaveras Reservoir involves a programme of coöperation between the city and Spring Valley.

This programme, drawn up by the Railroad Commission and approved unanimously by the Supervisors, contains the following items:

The city constructs the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit from Irvington to Crystal Springs Reservoir, and permits the company to use it.

The company increases the capacity of Calaveras Dam and conduit facilities to Irvington, in order to develop the additional supply of 24 million gallons daily.

The company pays the city interest on the construction of the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy aqueduct during the construction period (not to exceed three years), and thereafter, during the term of the agreement, pays the city annually for the use of the conduit.

The company establishes from its surplus a fund to amortize in 12 years the capital expenditures made by the company on Calaveras Dam and other structures and costs necessary for the delivery of the additional supply.

After providing each year for operating expenses, taxes, use and operation of the city's conduit, depreciation, interest, dividends at five per cent, and contributions to the amortization fund, the balance of the company's revenue is apportioned equally between the amortization fund and the company's surplus.

The city gets a 12-year option to purchase the company's properties offered to the electors in March, 1921, at the price then fixed, plus certain specified capital expenditures.

If the city buys, it acquires the amortization fund.

All this is a long step forward in the relations of a municipality and a privately owned water system. It sets a precedent in water service.

"LITTLE OLD NEW YORK."

This play is a direct descendant of the Boucicault drama. It was written by shrewd Rida Johnson Young because she recognized that there was a certain proportion of the theatre-going public that still clung to the Irish tradition; or to the idea of the mythical Irish character, half sentiment, half humor, that is now become a rigid and unchangeable type. This new traditional type Boucicault used over and over again, and became rich and famous on it. If Denis O'Sullivan had lived he might possibly have inherited a fold of Boucicault's mantle and made money by his revival of the Boucicault plays.

Chauncey Olcott, although no longer young, still plays the same broth of a boy that we are familiar with, and his spalpeens have made him rich.

"Little Old New York" is not a title suggestive of the moss-encrusted Irish play of tradition. But the astute author of the piece belongs, I should judge, to that order of playwright that takes no chances. She is "out for the stuff"; and, with her practiced finger on the public pulse, she said to herself, "I will mix Americanism and Irishism and New Yorkism, and I'll get them."

And she did. "Little Old New York" was running several years ago in New York, where it caught the public with the bait of the title—which has its literal as well as its modern significance, and is a good one—and the introduction into the list of characters of men who, away back in the beginning of the nineteenth century, founded the Astor and Vanderbilt dynasties. No doubt the New Yorker who knows his New York recognizes, in the stage portrait of old John Jacob Astor, a resemblance to some portrait on canvas of that weighty personage. Cornelius Vanderbilt, however, is a young man in the play, and the revived scions of the Schuyler and De Puyster families, and the impersonations of Washington Irving, FitzGreen Halleck, Henry Brevoort and Peter Delmonico, are merely those of young people whose names lend a fictitious value to the play, their identity having nothing to do with the workings of the plot.

The play belongs to adult fairy-tale drama; that is drama in which the spectator wishes to be thoroughly befooled into getting away from the prose of everyday living. There is nothing but open, almost avowed, artifice in the story of "Little Old New York," which shows an artless young impostor in the shape of a girl in her teens come over from Ireland passing herself off as her dead brother, who was the heir to a large estate.

Sometimes actresses have tried, and almost succeeded, in making themselves look like male striplings. It is a difficult feat, more difficult than that of male players impersonating women.

Isabelle Lowe, however, can not be said to have attempted to do anything with Patricia O'Day—except to make her Irishly cute and cunning entirely in a feminine way. A babe in arms would have known that the pantalooned figure—the young gallants in the play all wore the old-time, closely-fitting pantaloons—was of the same sex as its mother. The author was rather too liberal in endowing Patricia with ornamental qualities. She must have a brouge, she is portrayed as an irresistible witch, and she must sing, dance, and play the harp, besides having at the end of a ready tongue a bit of neat Irish repartee.

These various requirements Isabelle Lowe grappled with valiantly, overcoming the brouge, just playing with the harp, tackling the Irish jig pretty well, but being thoroughly unhorsed by the songs.

Quite a large cast is necessary to represent the play, the company being of mediocre ability.

Creighton Hale, the leading man, seems to have, as his special attraction, an equipment of good looks.

While Miss Lowe, against odds, finally scored in the play, the player who won the warmest response from the audience was Walter Scott Weeks, who, in the rôle of "Bully Boy," a prize-fighter, irresistibly tickled the ribs of the knowing ones in the audience by his take-off of some "pug" identity unknown to the unsophisticated.

I should add, for the delectation of the gay young gents who may read this estimate of "Little Old New York," that it includes a representation of an interrupted prize-fight, in which two bare-torsoed young men thump each other in a manner which, I should judge from the sacrilegious laughter of the audience, was something of a burlesque on the real, the sacred technique, of the art of pugilism.

THE ORPHEUM.

Crane Wilbur is a big headliner this week, and an attraction that can not be withstood, especially as he is supported by Suzanne Caubet, a pretty young Frenchwoman who is related to Mme. Bernhardt. "Right or Wrong" is the name of the piece, which opens imposingly in a red-curtained night court presided over by a gowned and lily-handed judge. The piece is an amusing bit of whimsicality, the comedy and repartee dashing off at unexpected tangents. It might be called a nut comedy on account of its studied but thoroughly amusing irrationality.

Mr. Wilbur, with his well-featured face, trained actor's voice, and rather impressive personality, shows, nevertheless, a very decided vein of humor. Suzanne Caubet, her clear, brunette tints set off by a yellow silk frock, is rather good to look at, and owns a fascinating little accent. The wayward humor of the piece keeps up steadily, the judge, played by William H. Barwald, contributing his share, and as there is a touch of romance mixed with its whimsical humor, it goes gayly and well.

"A Theatre Episode," played in chief by Stan Stanley, may be said to be a prolonged scrap between Stanley in the audience and an entertainer on the stage, except for the dollar-a-kiss interlude. Stan Stanley possesses a tall person, a penetrating voice, and a broad and ample gift of humor, all of which stand out freely from his extinguishing seat in the auditorium. The act goes with plenty of pepper and makes a hit.

I lost "The Gyp" and the ball game novelty, but the "Bird Cabaret," which consists of a collection of very loquacious parrots and cockatoos led by an equally talkative woman trainer, amused the audience, because of the tricks, whistles, exclamations and coherent utterances of the feathered talkers.

The rest of the bill consists of a barber-shop burlesque, in which there was much vivid Hebrew accent and a tuneful quartet, and several good left-overs.

CONSIDER THE CHILDREN.

The other day I went to a picture-play at which there were shoals of children. The piece was of the enthralling type the public so loves: a pretty, lively, unsubduable American girl, scads of young men making up to her, drama, melodrama, and hyper-melodrama. There were scenes in a foreign land—with the "made-in-America" brand on them—foreign gentlemen with dark eyes, stilletoes, and lava-like eruptions of erotic emotion. The American heroine, thoroughly modern in her venturesomeness, was old-school in one respect. The American flapper of the present epoch, according to the realistic fiction of the day, written largely by brilliant young journalists who presumably know whereof they speak, stops at nothing; for so it is whispered, also at tea-tables and behind fans. And nobody knows as to the truth of the stories, for on the features of many of the grown young girls of the present generation is written that strange sophistication and that unbreakable reserve which mothers no longer can penetrate.

It is a queer epoch, and no man knows in what shape our young womankind are going to emerge; in two shapes, probably, for the instinctively law-abiding will become used to their freedom, and know how to use it to walk in safe paths, while the others will gayly caracol along the shady lanes that lead to mud and muck, and perhaps death in the stifling quicksands of license.

Well, our young American in the play belonged to that type which, during the past two or three decades, has so puzzled Europeans. She Daisy-Millered her way through all kinds of shady places, and with several queer, not to say fishy groups of men and women. And the bright, flaunting lily had not a single withered spot on its gay petals.

This won the audience. And I know that, since in the end dauntless young America got trapped, knifed, escaped, and ended with edifying conclusions, that the authors would say, "That is a play with a moral."

But what revelations of adult emotions toward enticing young womanhood had already been made! Those numerous children in the audience, male and female, were having their own instinctive emotions prematurely awakened. One felt sorry for them, on account of their too early initiation into such feelings; an initiation which has helped toward the growth of that mask-like reserve on the countenance of careless girlhood. But what are we going to do about it? For to the adult toilers these picture-plays of adventure are what fairy tales are to the children. They want to escape from the sordid realism of life, and the pictures give their starved imagination some vent. And the children are part of the family, and go, too; and so the taste is formed.

But there is light ahead. For the next day I read an announcement that the Mission Film Corporation is going to make a series of picture-plays for children, in which fairy stories will be scenarioed, the rôles to be acted by children. Even now, indeed, a group of talented juveniles are under training, with an expert to guide them, Mrs. Lucy A. Cuddy, who has a dramatic department in the State Teachers' College—formerly known as the San Francisco Normal School—having already had considerable experience in training children for child plays. She has made adaptations from fairy stories herself, and has such tact with the children that she woos them away from the danger of being stage automata.

Mr. Léon Rice, vice-president of the Mission Film Corporation, says that the organization has received many requests to film child plays from women's clubs, teachers, and parents; which is encouraging, after seeing the spectacle already described.

Of course some children, having acquired the taste for caviar, could scarcely refine their palates to approving draughts of moon-drenched dew and the ambrosia of fairy beakers; but to many the new order of things will be rapturously welcomed, and not only by them, but by the grown children who father and mother them.

LOCAL COLLABORATION.

Ralph Pincus and Marjorie Driscoll know enough about theatres, even although neither is a public performer, to dare to venture into the field of theatrical composition. Mr. Pincus being a seasoned business manager at the Columbia, while Miss Driscoll is a bright and perspicacious critic. Hence the collaboration of these two local lights resulted in a piece which, placed in first-class hands, ought to win applause and laughter from the lovers of musical comedy.

For musical comedy it is, "A Night in Hollywood" containing a number of ditties and lively choruses, which were rendered in good style by a youthful and shapely chorus.

The idea is good: showing the internal workings of a movie studio, and more particularly of movie players, in a humorous light. Naturally the piece does not go with the sure momentum of one evolved by sophisticated craftsmen, but it has a lively crackle of jokes which win the approval of hilarity from the audience, and the scene which showed two girl aspirants trying to make a hit with the camera interested keenly the movie fans that were present.

More could be done with this scene; with the whole piece, in fact, for it needs to be screwed up to a higher concert pitch.

That will come, however. It may be said, so far, to have been tried on the Mission dog, which barked hilarious approval. But the two collaborators will find it well worth while to develop more and funnier business for their comedians, and to give a greater air of spontaneity to the comedy.

The piece being in such good working shape, well provided with lively music, and with comicallities able to win laughter and applause, will probably, by degrees, if it is played on the road, develop into a smoothly running comedy that will bring financial recognition.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Perhaps the most positive proof of the increase of Royalist ideas in France is the canonization of Joan of Arc. Ten years ago those who were working for her were ignominiously treated by the republican government, some of them having been thrown into prison. This year the same government was obliged to participate officially at the festivities organized by l'Action Française throughout France in honor of the saintly maiden who had delivered her country from the slavery of conquest.—Count S. C. de Soissons in the Contemporary Review.

The mortgage business is one of the oldest businesses in the world. Back in the days of ancient Babylon, 3000 years before Christ, mortgage transactions were recorded in clay, which was burned to a brick for the purpose of preservation. Some of the bricks have recently been unearthed in the Babylonian ruins, and are concrete evidence of the existence of the mortgage business centuries before the great event in Bethlehem of Judea.

The Columbia Theatre.

The success of "Little Old New York" was very apparent on the opening night, when the Columbia was crowded; and it has been so at every performance since. The second and last week of this play begins Monday night. There is a distinct charm to "Little Old New York" and a very charming star plays the rôle of the masquerading Irish lassie.

Mrs. Thomas Whiffen has been specially engaged to play the rôle assumed by her in the Henry Miller's Theatre production of "Just Suppose," announced to follow "Little Old New York." Mrs. Whiffen, Isabelle Lowe, Creighton Hale and others will be in the cast of the A. E. Thomas play.

Just suppose that the Prince of Wales, during his recent visit to this country a couple of years ago, had traveled incognito, met a young American girl, and fallen in love with her. That is the supposition—without the name of the prince, of course—that forms the basis of this charming play.

The Orpheum Next Week.

"Gus Edwards' Fifteenth Annual Song Revue" is characteristic of previous productions, in that it is resplendent with costumes, scenery, songs and girls, with a whole new flock of protégés and Gus Edwards' own personality and showmanship. This season Orpheum patrons will see the Broadway production in the new Gus Edwards' Revue.

Harry Carroll and the Varieties of 1922 attained popularity in their recent engagement here, and the management has had so many requests for another showing of this act that a return engagement has been arranged, for the one week only.

Tom Smith has a fund of humor and good nature combined, with an unusual talent for making people laugh.

As the blackface chauffeur of a rolling chair Joe Rolley is one of the biggest laughs one could find anywhere. He is an untutored comedian naturally, and with his excellent material should be as popular as when last seen here, featured with Anderson's Frivolities.

Gus Edwards' little Scotch immigrant protégé, "Sandy," is proving himself a capable single entertainer, and delights with his songs, stories, and broad dialect.

It is some time since Princess Radjah has been West and any who remember her will remember a great dancer.

Bert and Hazel Skatelle are a clever pair who are offering a surprising novelty.

The Players Theatre.

Monday night, August 7th, brings the initial performance of "The First Fifty Years," the unique study of married life by Henry Myers, to the Players Theatre, Bush Street near Gough. It also marks the return of Evelyn Vaughan to the legitimate stage, after an absence of four years, in what is said to be the most congenial rôle she has ever had. Opposite her will be William S. Rainey, recently returned from a successful season in New York. Reginald Travers is directing.

The play, declared to be astonishingly effective, has just completed a season's run at the Princess Theatre, New York, and it is offered to San Franciscans through arrangements with the Shuberts, even before Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston have an opportunity of seeing it. There are seven episodes, the first being the wedding day in 1872, and the others the various anniversaries down to the golden wedding in 1922.

The author treats his subject courageously, but with a humor that is a welcome leaven to some of the more serious moments. The production is scheduled for two weeks, with matinees on Tuesdays and Saturdays.

Ocotopus numbering more than 5000 were landed during a recent week by the fishermen of Northern France.

VANITY FAIR.

A poor little flapper in New York bobbed her pretty blonde hair and then repented, and brooded over it until life seemed of no further value, so she locked the door, turned on the gas, and died. It is a singular case of reaction to a complex mental content that urged her two ways at once, and it was aggravated to a fatal end by an inverted appraisal of the values involved. Either life is not worth all the fuss we make about it, or it is worth so infinitely much more that such considerations as bobbed hair, long hair, or no hair at all should make little impression on us. The victim of so perverted a view was improperly educated, and lacked the right outlook. If she had had some remnants of recollection from her school days of the nature of the physical universe, of the main courses of history, of the wanderings of Aeneas, or of the battles of the demigods "far on the ringing plains of windy Troy," or had retained in memory some far faint cadences from "the surge and thunder of the Odyssey," she would have had a wider view of the vast human drama, a better perspective of her own personality and her own hair. If she was a young person to whom modernized education had brought no hint of the so-called "humanities," with their broadening and disciplinary effect, their presentations of society and the individual, their constructive results in the up-building of the will and character, then she was indeed an unfortunate, bereft of the best intellectual heritage of the race, robbed of the moral support of common humanity, but there still would have been left her a way of regarding life that might have soothed her morbid sensibilities when that was her need: it is, in the best French manner, to regard the mundane pageant with less solemnity, to take it more as a joke. Whose joke, we may not know. But this is evident, that most of us take life too seriously for our own good, or any other person's good. Life is not all a funeral; or, if it is, we would do better with it in most cases if we treated it like the man in the limerick, who "just came along for the ride." Duties must be done, responsibilities discharged; but their full discharge entitles us, at the end of the day, to grin at the rest of the mummer's parade.

The manufacturers of American perfumes have found themselves sadly put to it, since the Eighteenth Amendment, for a vehicle of sweet flavors. Denatured alcohol is not remarkable for the sweetness of its scent, any more than the famous durian fruit of Siam. It is said that this fruit is so delicious to the palate that if you can get a bit of it past your nose, either by the clothespin method of administering oil to children, or by having a friend perform the office of the clothespin, or by plugging the nostrils with cotton, or taking ether first, or having somebody throw you down and stuff it into your mouth, you will be forever addicted to the eating of the noisome vegetable, and will long for the return of the official season as fervently as a baseball fan longs for the hard feel of the bleachers under his bones. But perfume made from denatured alcohol can not be eaten, and so there is no compensation for the horrible, almost opiodian reek Mr. Volstead has introduced into spirits. Perfume thus compounded can not even be used as a beverage; which seems to be the dark purpose of the flavor aforesaid. Perfumery that smells of the Volstead Act is not of much more value than the sort that emanates from those cunning little back-striped kittens one sometimes meets in the woods. No odor of flowers can compete with diethyl phthalate, unless perhaps they are onion flowers. And like the durian it is hard to get it past the nose. On the other hand, if it were not for the denaturing of the alcoholic content of the perfumery, society would soon find itself involved in a series of reciprocal perfumery parties, where people indulged in ylang ylang cocktails and brightened their wits and reminiscences with chypre punch or julep au Houbigant. And how about flavoring extracts? Have all the possibilities been extracted from them? Time was when no Siwash potlatch could be considered a social success without plenty of lemon and vanilla. Taken straight it was a great testimonial to the durability of the Siwash stomach. The case seems serious for the American manufacturers, required by the law to compete, if they manufacture at all, with the French and German perfumers, whose product still has possibilities.

It is now suggested in Margaret Emerson Bailey's book, "The Value of Good Manners" (Doubleday, Page & Co.), that a hostess can hardly tell whether her house guests are going to be comfortable or not unless she pays herself a visit in her own guest chamber. A dear, Mawruss! Very like daring a man to eat in one's restaurant, or suggesting to the sheriff that he try the gallows himself, and see whether or not he can take the stretch out of the rope with his own neck. We have often wondered if our hostess knew that the door would not lock, that the bed had a bad spring, that the floor above creaked when any one walked over it so that sleep was a rarity, that we like lots of blankets, and that we hate sheets that are long at the top and turn down over the covers supposedly, but really give us only the comfort that comes from getting our neck entangled in them and dreaming we are being sacrificed to Bowanee or some other glum deity by means of the strangling-cord of an East Indian thug. This experimenting on yourself certainly has sense in or about it. "Suppose we try it," Miss Bailey says. "The room looks charming as we enter it, and the better to appreciate all its attractions, we start to take a rest. But where? There is no couch. And we never could stretch out comfortably and irresponsibly upon that immaculately starched or silken spread. We think over our past visitors. Did they, when they were tired, sit bolt upright? Did they play going to Jerusalem upon two chairs? Did they in desperation camp upon the floor? There is an hour left before dinner. If we may not lie down, we may still write a note. Paper and envelopes are on the desk, stamps placed neatly in the box beside them; but when we dip our pen into the ink-well it is dry. Suppose, instead, we read, and our eye runs over the books which we ourselves have placed beside the bed. 'Sesame and Lilies.' Good heavens! We had that in boarding-school. It was almost time to dress. We found ourselves in the bathroom with a little scrubby piece of soap in the soap basin and with no face cloth on the rack. Somehow, the end of a damask towel did not take the place. We looked in the cushion for a pin. Even the four were gone that held on its dainty cover. By the last guest, in desperation, they had been removed. We came to the uncomfortable conviction that, having once supplied our guest room, we had supposed that our supplies were lasting. It was much as though we had gone on writing checks without ever stopping to deposit a fresh balance at the bank."

It appears, after all, that long since the revels of Flora in ancient Rome, there has been worse garb for women than one sees on Fifth Avenue and on Powell Street today. Lady Norah Bentick, who wrote a book about the former Kaiser in exile, calls attention to some of the individual vagaries of the recent past, as an indication that conformity to fashion may really have a restraining effect instead of the reverse. She says: "Princess Pauline Metternich, at a state ball at the Tuileries, appeared before Napoleon III and the Empress Eugénie with her hair hanging down her back and nude to the waist. The Princess Castiglione was notorious for the beauty of her figure, and her sculptured leg is in one of the chief museums of Italy today. At a ball she was so little clothed that the Empress Eugénie ordered her chamberlain to take to the princess a shawl. One of Napoleon's women was so proud of her legs and feet that she drove about Rome with her bare legs hanging out of the carriage window." Now, there's style for you—and independence of the dictates of the dressmakers. It will be noticed that the Princess Pauline had not bobbed her hair, but that is about all we should be permitted to notice about her. The Princess Castiglione would have run Lady Godiva close. And think of that one of Napoleon's women, which is not stated, who drove about Rome in that exceedingly unconventional way. We had a sport in San Francisco who rode home in two hacks at once—by hanging onto a hand of either cabby and running along between, and it was in the days of cobblestone pavements, too. But he was not strictly sober at the time—not strictly. And we have no knowledge that the lady described above was anything but sober as a judge. It must have been very uncomfortable as well as unconventional. But what an advertisement it would make for a taxicab company!

Promoting Peace.

The federation of British music industries has been discussing the best means of starting a boom for British musical instruments. Joseph Riley of Birmingham thinks the best way would be to light a huge bonfire of old pianos. That, he says, would only be following the excellent example set by the music trade in America.

"It would make the finest sort of a display advertisement," he adds, "for it would show the country that the old pianos with which we are overstocked are not worth having."

"We could easily collect 10,000 of them," he said, "and nobody would miss them. Such rubbishy tinkling bundles of discords do incalculable harm to the music taste of the public. A child taught on one of them has all his musical instincts outraged and grows up, musically speaking, a sorrow to his prematurely aged parents."

The great Italian actress, Eleonora Duse, is returning to the stage. Her first appearance will be in a French play at Milan. She was born in 1859.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A thin man resented the lateral pressure of a fat man on the same seat in the street-car. He said: "They ought to charge by weight in these cars." "If they did, sonny," said the fat man, "you'd have to walk. They couldn't afford to stop for you."

"Why are you late?" demanded a man of his colored servant. "Boss, I done got kicked by a mule." "Well, it shouldn't have taken you an hour to get yourself kicked by a mule." "Oh, it didn't take long to get kicked, boss, but he kicked me in de wrong direction."

The bills had come in for building the young couple's home. "George," said the bride of a few months, "they are twice what we expected!" "Don't worry," said the young husband. "I expected they would be." "But George," she replied, "they're twice as much as that."

Tommy and little Joan in the second primary grade were great friends. Tommy was a bright youngster, but he was lazy. His teacher, wishing to impress on him the importance of study, told him, "If you don't work harder, little Joan will be promoted and you will have to stay back in this class. How will you like that?" "Oh," said Tommy, nonchalantly, "I guess there will be other little Joans."

The guns were popping over the moors and the pheasants were flying all about, but few were falling. One gun was especially unlucky. He shot time after time, but every time the bird got away. "I say," he remarked to the attendant game-keeper, "they're terribly strong on the wing today, what?" "Ho no, sir," said the keeper, "that's the same bird, sir." "The same bird? What the devil is the beggar following me about for, do you suppose?" "Beg pardon, sir, I think it's for safety, sir."

A Virginia gentleman was troubled by a disobedient and lazy coachman, who had been in the family a long time, and was well out of reach of discipline. He disobeyed orders and neglected his duties and made himself a general nuisance until in desperation his employer decided to threaten him with dismissal. "I can't put up with you any longer," he said. "At the end of the month you hunt another place." "Nuther place, nothin'," was the reply. "I druv yeh to yer baptisin', I druv yeh to yer weddin', an' I'll jest stick here till I drives yeh to yer funeral."

Mildred envied Patty her grandmother, for, as she explained, her own was in heaven. And she and Patty's grandmother were good friends until one day the grandmother was cross. She scolded the two little girls for leaving the screen door open, for walking in a flower bed and dropping crumbs on the floor. The two youngsters sought refuge on the porch. Grandmother started to follow them there a little later, to try to make up. She realized the necessity of doing so, for when she reached the door she heard Mildred say, "Patty, I wish your grandmother was visitin' my grandmother today."

A Mark Twain story recorded by Chauncey Depew in his "Memories of Eighty Years" relates an incident at a dinner party at Homberg. There was a dead silence whenever there was the slightest sign that the great humorist was going to make a remark, but to the company's disappointment he did not commit himself. The following evening the same company was again assembled and at last Mark told a story. There was great laughter, the fun being over the fact that Depew had told the same story to the same company the night before.

In the early days of the Canadian West a Scotchman named Duncan MacArthur and his wife Janet ranched a tract of land about forty miles west of the steel town of Verona. Duncan was a past master at the national accomplishment and on market days always returned home gloriously drunk. Janet's schemes to convert him always failed, but in desperation she tried one more. On market day she said, "Duncan, every time you take a drink today I'm going to take one, too." The incorrigible Duncan replied, "Then ye'll be gude and drunk by 6 o'clock, Mrs. MacArthur."

One of Judge's prize stories is as follows: An old Southern planter (once "Marse Davy") said to an old negro: "Well, Tony, this is our birthday again—seventy-five years we've been together, as man and boy; three-quarters of a century and on one plantation." "Sho nuff hit is, boss—and 'pears lak dese here years is a traveling aroun' a heap perter dan dey uster." "That's what's on my mind, Tony, and in the course of events we can't expect to remain here much longer—so I've been thinking seriously, Tony—seriously—about the grave and the hereafter." "Wat's dat, boss?" "Well, I want to make a bargain with you, Tony, a solemn bargain, to this effect.

Whichever one goes first, he will come back from the spirit world and tell the other one just what it looks like over there." "Hit's a bargain, suh. Dat suits me adzackly. But"—reflectively—"but, Marse Davy, if you goes fust, won't you come back in de daytime?"

A theatrical manager bought and staged a play and then became cursed with the usual doubts. He felt that it would never go. The author stood in the wings at dress rehearsal, very proud and confident, in irritating contrast with the gloomy manager. One of the stage hands was a person of peculiar aspect, and just to make conversation the author asked, "Who is that strange-looking fellow?" "That?" said the manager. "That's an Eskimo." "Why in the world an Eskimo?" asked the author. "Why," said the manager wearily, "we had to get somebody that could stand the frost around here opening night."

An English priest, Monsignor Bickerstaffe-Drew, has written his recollections of Cardinal Manning. The Cardinal was evidently anything but a severe or lugubrious person. Being in Norwich one day during a heavy shower, Manning happened to take shelter in a chemist's shop in company with a very severe-looking lady. Wishing to be agreeable, Manning tried to say something apropos of the occasion or of Norwich and quoted, "The man in the moon came down too soon and lost his way to Norwich. The man in the south has burnt his mouth with eating of cold plum porridge." "I hate a fool," remarked the austere lady.

THE MERRY MUZE.

Mirth Control.

Are you the boob who likes to go
To see a funny music show,
And though you've paid three dollars flat
To sit exactly where you're at—
All comfy in the orchestra,
You never lend your good ha-ha?
Instead, you dare the man whose chaff
Makes others roar—to make you laugh!
You'd rather eye this comic cuss—
Immobile and impervious;
You wouldn't flinch to save your soul,
For you believe in mirth control!

Are you the boob who likes to be "Wished on" a jovial company
Where stories new and stories old
Are told—while you sit clammy-cold
With long-trained poker-face
That shuns emotion's slightest trace (Unless your twitchless skin should deign
A grin that is akin to pain)—
But not a laugh to save your soul
Since you believe in mirth control!

Are you the boob who, though you see
The funny thing that's meant to be—
You wouldn't let your neighbor know
You thought it so; you'd rather go
Cowled in your cloakings taciturn,
And strangle joy before it's born—
Or ever laugh—so help your soul—
Since you believe in mirth control!

—Anthony Euwer in Judge.

Former Conferences

The conclusion of the Genoa Conference is a fresh reminder to the world of the frequent resort which has been made to such gatherings and of the comparative meagreness of their results, says the New York Tribune.

It was always so. A few minutes sufficient to provoke war. It takes months and sometimes years to repair its evils.

The conferences of former times were called congresses, and were likewise held in more or less arbitrarily designated cities. The Congress of Westphalia, at the end of the Thirty Years' War, lasted six years. The Congress of Utrecht, after the war of the Spanish succession, was opened January 26, 1712, and did not end before April 11, 1713.

This congress was attended, behind the scenes, by a man who was a precursor, for it was he who first had the idea of the Society of Nations. This was Cardinal Polignac, the secretary of the French plenipotentiary.

During the long, idle hours which the discussions of the diplomats afforded him in the little Hollandish town of Utrecht, he composed his "Projet de Paix perpétuelle," in which he proposed the creation of a supreme tribunal of nations.

It required more than two hundred years of war and massacre to take up this idea again.

Nothing is more obviously false than that the remedy for the inequality among men consists in their return to the condition of savages and beasts. Philosophy will never be understood if we approach the study of its mysteries with so narrow and illiberal conceptions of its universality.—Shelley.

By a curious "freak" of Nature, insects which are the most beautiful when fully developed, are often the most repulsive in the grub stage.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of CYCOL as shown on the CYCOL Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Social Notes.

Colonel and Mrs. Louis Ray Burgess have announced in Honolulu the engagement of their daughter, Barbara, to Mr. Robert Vernon Lee, United States Corps of Cadets.

Mrs. Mansfield Lovell announces the engagement of her daughter, Miss Minerva Lovell, to Mr. Angus Gordon Nicolson of Bridgeport, Connecticut. Miss Lovell is identified with the younger social set, and is a member of one of California's pioneer families, being the granddaughter of the late Charles W. Hathaway. Her father, the late Mansfield Lovell, was a well-known business man. Mr. Nicolson has recently resigned as an ensign, having joined the navy at the outbreak of the world war. No date has been set for the wedding.

At a luncheon given by Miss Helen Smyth on Saturday the announcement of her engagement to Mr. Norman Waterloo Ford was made. The date for the wedding of Miss Smyth and Mr. Ford has not been set. Miss Smyth is the sister of Mr. Robert Smyth and Mr. Hugo Smyth, both in the American consular service. Mrs. Alfred B. Ford entertained on Tuesday afternoon at tea, introducing Miss Helen Smyth, fiancée of Mrs. Ford's son, and also complimenting Mrs. Sydney Waterloo Ford, the former Miss Margaret Belden, who is here on a visit from her home in New Zealand. At the tea Mrs. Bernard Ford, who returned recently from Europe, and Mrs. Arthur W. Ford assisted the hostess in receiving.

Mrs. Hope Somerset has set the date for her wedding to Mr. Donald Walsh, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward M. Walsh, for August 30th. Miss Somerset has named Miss Harriet Fletcher, a classmate at Vassar, for her maid of honor. The bridesmaids are to be Miss Elizabeth Moore, Miss Dorothy Grissim, Miss Katherine Bentley, and Mrs. Edward Fennon. At a luncheon which Mrs. Fennon gave on Wednesday, complimenting Miss Somerset, the plans for the wedding were disclosed. Several hundred invitations are being issued.

Miss Cornelia Clappett is to be married in Paris in the early autumn to Mr. William Shuman. A wedding tour of some months will follow the ceremony, after which the couple will return to San Francisco to make their home. Miss Clappett is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Clappett, who are now making Paris their home.

MR. TAFT IN THE TEMPLE.

Mr. Taft, the Chief Justice of the United States of America, was the guest of the bench and bar of England at the ancient hall of the Middle Temple, an honor rarely accorded, and much more rarely accorded with the enthusiasm and seriousness that attended Wednesday's festival, says the Manchester Guardian.

The lord chancellor was in the chair, and Lord Haldane, Lord Hewart, Lord Shaw, Lord Carson, Lord Desart, Lord Parmoor, Lord Cave, the master of the rolls, Sir John Simon, Sir Ernest Pollock, Sir Leslie Scott, Sir Edward Shortt, and nearly all the distinguished lawyers of the land were present. According to counsel's opinion the gathering was one of the most notable ever held in this famous hall.

Lord Birkenhead, in an almost conversational tone, proposed the toast of their distinguished guest. "I have been twenty-three years at the bar and on the bench," he said, "and I can not recall more than three or four occasions upon which the bench and bar of England have had the pleasure of entertaining guests of our calling. We desire you, sir, to go from us neither as a judge, a statesman, nor a lawyer, but as one friend who had clasped the hands of other friends, and with the realization of all of us that we shall receive you again." It was as much his hall as theirs. He recalled that the common law of England ruled in his country, and they talked the same language as the lawyers of America.

The lord chancellor defined the common law to the acceptance of the company as the machinery by which a man might defend himself for his rightful actions. Both countries were the joint heirs of the English law, but America had a written Constitution and England had not.

Mr. Taft, when he rose to reply, was received with extraordinary enthusiasm, the company rising and for some time waving and cheering. He spoke quietly with a rein upon his feelings, which he relaxed a little towards the end of his speech. From his earliest boyhood, he said, he had venerated the British bench and the British bar, but never in his wildest imagination as a boy had he realized that he would stand in their presence and receive from the great English bench and the great English bar such a welcome.

Speaking of the English common law, he said that the English law had insisted that any man who was an adult and in his right mind stood on his feet and acted for himself. That was the spirit that animated English law. He ended his speech by a quotation from a man of Memphis, speaking at 3 o'clock in the morning, who thanked his hosts for their "ferocious hospitality."

What seemed to him the most extraordinary feature of his experiences that evening was the idea that he could joke with the lord chancellor (which, apparently, he had done).

Mr. Taft ended on an unpremeditated note of emotion, in which he spoke of his reception "as if I were a real brother of yours." On that key he said farewell. It was a high occasion, carried through with a restraint which covered a great deal of profound feeling.

Shakespeare's Handwriting.

The intricacies of Elizabethan handwriting are discussed in a current number of the English Library by Mr. Hilary Jenkinson, who describes no less than eight distinct styles, together with a possible ninth, about which he does not feel quite sure, says the Living Age. In his paper, which is called "Elizabethan Handwritings, a Preliminary Study," he makes some remarks that appear to shed light on the vexed question of Shakespeare's hand.

Mr. Jenkinson points out that it was a frequent occurrence for an educated Elizabethan to have two styles of handwriting, and he applies this to the disputed autographs of Spenser. This leads another writer in the Saturday Review to take up the Jenkinson theory and apply it to Shakespeare, suggesting that perhaps he wrote both the Italian hand, which was coming into fashion in his day, as well as the ordinary cramped English hand of the times. This suggestion, which had been put forward before Mr. Jenkinson's paper, was at first received with more or less contempt by critics, but its position seems to be made somewhat stronger by his ideas.

Mr. Jenkinson points out another fact which may affect disastrously the authenticity of some precious autographs. It appears that copying clerks of that time—when the typewriter was an undreamed-of blessing—had a habit, when they were transcribing a document, of copying the signature also, writing it in a hand different from that of the document itself. Hence a paper may appear to have been copied by a clerk and then signed by the author when, as a matter of fact, the whole thing is a clerk's workmanship. It is said that a series of facsimiles of Elizabethan handwritings are to be issued presently to assist students.

The man who has fewest bodily wants approaches nearest to the Divine Nature. Satisfy these wants at the cheapest rate, and expend the remaining energies of your nature in the attainment of virtue and knowledge.—Shelley.

CURRENT VERSE.

To the Little Masters.

You little masters of the world,
Whose words are subtle stings
Build up your walls before our feet,
Your ceilings for our wings,
Saying, "You may not climb too far
Nor lift your flight too high Above our drab and decent ways
Where all the world goes by."

But we have seen the morning shine
And heard the mountains call,
Though sevenfold strong the prison be
The sevenfold strength shall fall.

A million saints with flashing feet
Have climbed beyond your sight;
A million singers lifted song
On wings of silver light.

As it has been, so it shall be
While scorn may claim her own;
By all the laughter of the years
You shall be overthrown.

Our feet shall pass beyond your door;
The clashing of our wings
Shall blind you, masters of the world—
Your words are little things.

—Marguerite Wilkinson in the Forum.

Twelfth Night.

O sweet slow tempo of those happier years
That left men leisure for so many things!
Leisure for music and for madness, too,
For adorations and for fertile tears,
Who listens now when comes the Fool who sings?
Who cries "Olivia!" the whole night through,
Or builds a willow cabin at the gate
Of his desire and stands importunate
Till air and earth give heed?

We have no time for anything but speed,
And scarcely know what we pursue
Or whither tend,
Or what far lover's meeting may await
The reckless journey's end!

—Anne Goodwin Winslow in the Freeman.

The Fish-Hawk.

On the large highway of the awful air that flows
Unbounded between sea and heaven, while twilight screened

The majestic distances, he moved and had repose;
On the huge wind of the Immensity he leaned
His steady body in long lapse of flight, and rose Gradual, through broad gyres of ever-climbing rest,

Up the clear stair of the eternal sky; and stood Throned on the summit! Slowly, with his widening breast, Widened around him the enormous Solitude,
From the gray rim of ocean to the glowing west.

Headlands and capes forlorn of the far coast, the land

Rolling her barrens toward the south, he, from his throne
Upon the gigantic wind, beheld: he hung—he fanned

The abyss for mighty joy, to feel beneath him strown
Pale pastures of the sea, with heaven on either hand,

The world with all her winds and waters, earth and air,
Fields, folds, and moving clouds. The awful and adored

Arches and endless aisles of vacancy, the fair
Void of sheer heights and hollows hailed him as her lord
And lover in the highest, to whom all heaven lay bare!

Till from that tower of ecstasy, that baffled height,
Stooping, he sank; and slowly on the world's wide way
Walked, with great wing on wing, the merciless, proud Might,

Hunting the huddled and lone reaches for his prey
Down the dim shore—and faded in the crumbling light.

Slowly the dusk covered the land. Like a great hymn
The sound of moving winds and waters was; the sea

Whispered a benediction, and the west grew dim
Where evening lifted her clear candles quietly.
Heaven, crowded with stars, trembled from rim to rim.

—John Hall Wheelock in Scribner's Magazine.

Children's Party at the Whitcomb.

A Mother Goose party and children's tea will be given in the roof garden of the Whitcomb Hotel on Saturday afternoon, August 19th, from 3 to 5 o'clock. Mary Carr Moore, as Mother Goose, will present a children's programme for the little folks. Fourteen young girls in costume, representing all the most famous of the nursery rhymes, will assist during the afternoon.

It is now said that Pancho Villa has become a peace-loving, hard-working, contented rancher, without political ambition, and with a desire to help his people.

At Del Monte.

The water baseball series and the aquatic events of the Olympic Club and the Del Monte Club at the Roman Plunge last weekend drew a large gathering.

Tennis is vying with swimming and the water sports, as the Del Monte tournament will bring many players into action. Miss Mary K. Browne, former national woman's champion, has been spending her vacation on the Monterey Peninsula, and is one of the contestants in the tournament.

Among the San Francisco and trans-bay society folk who have been visiting at Del Monte during the past week are Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Ball, Mr. and Mrs. Webster Jones, Miss Vail Jones, Miss Helen Huide, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis M. Aguirre, Mrs. George H. Dyer, Mrs. J. H. Baxter, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Prentice, Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Badger, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Goodman, David F. Selby, Miss H. F. Selby, Miss M. Keller, Clarence J. Selby, Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Strange, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Marin, Mrs. Orlando Stephens, Miss Florence Stephens, Mrs. Rexford Shaws, Mr. and Mrs. Lou H. Rose.

Coming Marriage of Dr. de Marville.

Those who remember Dr. H. B. de Marville, at one time chief surgeon to the San Francisco French Hospital, and for the last twelve years a practicing physician in the American colony in Paris, will be interested in knowing that he is soon to be married in London to Miss Dousset. While in California Dr. de Marville married Miss Cora Caduc (now deceased), a daughter of Commodore Caduc, a very accomplished young lady of great beauty, whose family was at that time socially prominent in San Francisco.

"How do you like my frock?" asked Eric's sister, when dressed for a dance. "It's—er—quite simple," stammered the young man. "Simple!" she laughed. "Do you know what it cost? Do you know that twenty golden sovereigns wouldn't cover it?" "Perhaps not," said Eric; "but thirty might, well spread out." —Toronto Globe.

"John," said the Old Man, thoughtfully, "I don't approve of you running around nights, with all kinds of flappers and flirts. Why don't you settle down and go with some particular girl?" "That's it, dad," said the kid, blithely, "they aint any of 'em so very particular these days." —Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Genoa a Thieves' Market?

It is universally admitted that the chief purpose of the conference at Genoa was to make accessible to exploitation by other nations the material resources of Russia, says David Jayne Hill in the North American Review. Let us imagine the conference completely successful in accomplishing this end. What would then happen when the nationals of the countries entering officially into a compact with the Bolsheviks were forced to complain that they were defrauded? There being no possible court of arbitration, the only alternative, unless these rights were to remain undefended, would be the use of force on a scale that would be equivalent to war. And what nation wishes to make a business bargain that involves the probability of war to give it effect?

The historian will have no difficulty in showing, with the documents in hand, that, when all the pious professions with which it is customary to make doubtful adventures seem respectable are stripped away, the Genoa Conference was a market for the purchase and sale of stolen property. Germany, being kept sternly apart from the private conversations between the Allied group and the Bolsheviks, began to suspect that the goods were being secretly delivered without consulting her, and demanded the signature of a treaty that had been for months under negotiation with the Bolsheviks. The Russians, on their side, anxious to have at least one good customer, in order to prove that they could do business, were ready to sign, and did so at Rapallo. The Allied group, filled with consternation at this development, made an adventurous bid in which the Belgians and French refused to participate, because it sacrificed the rights of private property. The Bolsheviks, preferring isolated deals to a bloc engagement which might ultimately unite the strength of Western Europe against them, rather insolently declined to accept this bid; and thus the one permanent positive achievement of the Conference of Genoa is the Russo-German treaty of Rapallo.

Assuring High Taxes.

It is interesting, and if there were nothing at stake it might be amusing, to observe the solicitude of some of the supervisors for a minimum salary scale for city employees. Supervisor Schmitz, for example, has introduced a resolution to the effect that no general clerk shall begin work for the city at less than $125 a month. This is in the interest of the standardization of salaries, for which high and holy object there is now a regular committee of the board. A disinterested observer, and for that matter an interested one, might be pardoned for wondering if this is not beginning at the wrong end—if this insurance of income ought not to begin rather with the taxpayer who provides the money than with the city employee who spends it. In the generally forgotten past we had in the charter such a provision. It was known as the dollar limit, and had, or was supposed to have, something to do with the tax rate, which in theory was not supposed to exceed it—except in case of emergency. But some emergencies arose, and others were invented, until the dollar limit has become a legendary, mythical thing, like the sojourn of angels on the earth, or that far-off day when the morning stars performed their celebrated choruses. A large judgment has recently been obtained against the city on account of excessive tax collection, which rather emphasizes than abates the disposition of the city fathers to exceed the limit. Without recourse to the gamble of litigation, there is nothing to assure the taxpayer that he may retain a reasonable minimum of what he earns, and that, under the convenient fiction of emergency legislation, the municipality will not take more and more of his earnings and pay out more and more of his money in minimum wages to employees. For in a tremendous number of instances it is not the real estate that pays the taxes—it is the taxpayer himself who must go down in his pocket to meet his bills, including the tax bill, and every assessment that comes along. That is usually true of vacant land, most of which never appreciates in value sufficiently to pay for carrying it; or, if it does, does it so reluctantly and tardily that it only benefits the snap-hunter. The heavy burdens on improved property either come out of the home-owner and his wife and children, who might enjoy spending a little of what the tax collector takes, or they are passed along to the tenant, who, in respect to himself, his wife and his children, is in similar case. A minimum wage might be well enough for city employees if the city were a profit-making institution. But it is far from that. It is rather a profit-taking one.

A Point of Honor.

The outstanding fact in the railroad situation is that the strike, strictly speaking, has failed. The men want to return to work; the railroads want them—or the bulk of them—back. But the situation is complicated. When the strike was called many old employees continued at their work, and a very considerable number of new men were taken on. The railroads gave pledges that in the final settlement every competent man that stayed on and every competent new man that joined the forces in the period of the strike should be kept on the job. Particularly it was promised that all men in employment when the strike should be settled should retain all the benefits attached to their jobs, including seniority rights. It was this promise that held many old employees and that attracted to the service many new men who abandoned other employments. From the beginning the point of seniority rights has been discussed generally and there can be no doubt that the pledge was given nor any doubt as to what it meant.

After many conferences, in which the President of the United States has participated, the strikers and the railroad authorities are in agreement that the strike should be brought to an end. A plan proposed by the President is that the men shall return to their work upon wage scales as they existed before the strike was called, leaving general adjustments, including the matter of seniority, to the Railroad Labor Board. But this affords only a partial solution of the difficulty. The men are willing to go back to work, but demand that their seniority rights shall be restored—that the status of the returned strikers shall not be what it was before the strike.

It will help to understanding of the situation to explain just what is implied in seniority rights. They are defined in a series of rules, the outcome of innumerable conferences between railroad managers and railroad employees and labor leaders in the course of many years, and were revised and partly re-created in the period of government operation. Rule 17 provides that employees serving on night shifts but desiring day work shall have preference when vacancies occur, according to their seniority. Rule 18 provides that the oldest employees in point of service, if capability is shown by trial, shall be given preference in filling such new jobs, or any vacancies as may be desired. Rule 20 provides that employees transferred from one point to another, with a view to accepting permanent transfer, will after thirty days lose seniority at the point they left, and that seniority at the point to which transfer shall be made will begin on the date of transfer. Rule 23 provides that long and faithful service on the part of men who have become unable to handle heavy work shall entitle such men to preference of such light work in their line as they may be able to handle. Rule 27 provides that when the force is reduced seniority as per Rule 31 [below] will govern, the men affected to take the rate of the job to which they are assigned. Rule 31 provides that seniority in each craft "shall be confined to the point employed, * * * except as provided in special rules of each craft."

Summarized, seniority means the length of time an employee has been continuously in the same class of service in a particular division or a particular yard or shop. In train and engine service seniority gives a man the right to choose his run when opportunity offers. In yard or shop service it gives him the right to choose his job in the same class of service, over those having junior seniority, provided he is qualified for the work. The principal value of seniority is regularity or permanency of employment. When there is a slump in business, or if for any other reason working forces are reduced, men of junior seniority are dropped from the pay-roll in the order of their seniority and those of older seniority remain at work. Seniority has nothing to do with term of service excepting in a particular division or in a particular yard or shop, or with pension privileges, because in the first instance term of service would mean the total time an employee has worked anywhere and at any class of work for the same employer. In the second instance, pension privileges are contingent on the number of years of continuous service in all classes of work, whereas seniority is contingent on the length of time an employee has been at work in a particular division or a particular yard or shop and generally in a particular class of work.

All this, taken in connection with the fact that in the period of the strike the seniority of old men who stayed on their jobs has been advanced, and that the seniority of men who have come newly to the work has been established, explains the matter now at issue between the railroads and the strikers. The proposition submitted to the railroad executives to return the strikers to work with unimpaired rights and privileges means that such strikers as have seniority older than other employees who loyally remained at work would take seniority over these men and would have the privilege to choose preferred jobs. It also means that the seniority of those who entered the service after the strike was called, July 1st, would be junior to the strikers, and that in case all the strikers were returned so as to make the force complete, the new men would be thrown out of employment. Or, in case of a slump in business or reduction in force for any other reason, these new men would all be dropped from the pay-roll before any of the strikers would be affected. Restoration of the strikers to their work with unimpaired seniority would make their term of service continuous from the time they first began work, provided there was no other break in continuity. But it would not restore pension privileges, as pension privileges are contingent on uninterrupted continuous service, and there is a break in continuity when an employee resigns or goes on strike and quits the service regardless of the length of time, whether for a day or a month, and regardless of seniority.

Since in recruiting the service in the period of the strike the railroad executives pledged themselves to the men newly taken on to continue them in their jobs there is involved in the situation a point of honor. A pledge may not be nullified by arbitration. A pledge is an obligation which may not honorably be disregarded. The proposal that the point at issue be submitted for determination to the Railroad Labor Board has a fairish sound. But how, without injustice to those who in good faith accepted assurances, how without involving themselves in an act of gross bad faith, can he railroad executives consent to submit the issue to anybody? Plainly it would be an act of repudiation.

Under the conditions the railroad executives have no choice. What they promised they should perform, though the heavens fall. To yield would be to sacrifice both public respect and self-respect. And nobody, not the President himself, has a moral right to ask the executives to stultify themselves. In the meantime transportation service must be continued; and it will be continued. So much the government will attend to even though it may have for a time to take over the roads. However, this may not be necessary. It will probably be sufficient for operation of the roads if the government will protect the men now on the job in their right to work. President Harding has pledged the government to this end under the broad principle which guarantees "conditions under which free men, willing to work, may work in safety."

The European Debts.

Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Mr. Otto Kahn no doubt have reasons for simultaneous declaration that the United States by an act of generous free will should cancel obligations that it holds against England and the several countries with which we cooperated in the war. The reasons, no doubt, are of a kind that appeal to financiers, who want to set the world a-going again on something like the old schedules to ends not more in behoof of humanity than that, as Shakespeare puts it, "profits may accrue." These obligations would make a serious situation if the United States government was pushing for settlement, but it is not doing so nor is it likely to do so. Nobody is being disturbed nor is in the way of disturbance through our urgency. So far as immediate effects are concerned, Europe's debts to us make no figure, since they are held in innocuous abeyance.

Something more than financial considerations, even if they were pressing, is connected with the situation. An American administration or an American party that would propose to make void these debts would do well at the same time to get its grave clothes ready. Generous as the American people are, it is not their habit, individually or collectively, to tear up notes of hand. It is not by this means that our position in world affairs has been attained, albeit that in one notable instance—that of the Boxer award—we gave to China a sum that had been decreed to us.

Whatever may be the future policy of the United States in regard to European obligations time only will tell. But one fairly certain guess is that we shall not cancel them. We may never enforce their payment, assuredly we shall not if to do so will increase the distress of the world. But we will not wipe out the record. This is not because we are lacking in sympathy or generosity, but because it would be alike in contempt of business principles, internationally a species of impertinence, politically and retroactively fatal all around.

If Britain knows her own interest, and she is commonly pretty keen at that point, she would not consent to cancellation of her debt. For the inevitable effect would be to create in this country a group or party so resentful and so powerful as not only to unhorse the administration of the immediate time, but to revive that old and now happily quiescent but still remembered Grudge. Britain, while at the moment hard up and embarrassed by her obligations—even unnecessarily anxious in the matter of her debt to us—has possessions that are of little value to her, but that would be worth a good deal to us. Jamaica, for example. It is only a little while ago that we acquired the Virgin Isles for a price. Is there not in the fact of this purchase, and in the proximity of Jamaica to the Panama Canal, a suggestion both pertinent and practical?

The Missouri Primary.

Prior to President Wilson's return from Europe and his campaign to put over the League of Nations, Senator Reed of Missouri, albeit a good deal of a blather-skite, was an administration favorite. Upon many occasions—upon one very notable occasion—he was the recipient of warm commendation at the hand of Mr. Wilson. But Mr. Reed did not see his way to support the President in his effort to attach the United States to the League of Nations; and from that day he was held by President Wilson in bitter hatred. Mr. Wilson is a good hater and his ill-will toward Reed was expressed in many ways. Even after his retirement from office there was no let-up in the Wilsonian resentment. When some three or four months ago Reed's campaign for renomination by the Democrats of Missouri came on, Mr. Wilson, from his retirement, wrote and made public a letter asking the Democrats of Missouri to repudiate him. He so far forgot the record as to reproach Reed for a course in the Senate in relation to which he had previously written him a letter of cordial approval. This open denunciation of Reed, with the expressed wish that he be not returned to the Senate, was of double significance—first, as marking a continuing and embittered feeling; second, as indicating a desire to continue as the head and dictator of the Democratic party. Missouri's answer is found in Reed's renomination over Breckenridge Long, who was presented as a friend of the ex-President and as representative of his purpose to hold the dominating hand over the Democracy, not only of Missouri, but of the whole country. It comes as a dramatic and pitiful climax to a career that should have buried its ambitions on the 4th of March, 1921.

Shingles and Such.

Shingles for roofing promise to become almost as troublesome between this time and the November election as the pathological variety that start from somewhere on the back of the tired business man and threaten to exterminate him if they meet in front; which they never do. In fact, a good many men in the lumber business are likely to contract shingles of the latter sort, if the voters confirm on referendum the proposed State Housing Law prohibiting shingles of the former sort. If this act is adopted it is going to be very bad for the shingle business, which is a considerable part of the lumber business, and like all other business is entitled to some consideration. In the meantime, shingles of either sort will be a gamble.

Some lumbermen intimate that prohibition of the use of shingles was guilefully introduced into the State Housing Law by certain manufacturers of the many kinds of incombustible roofing now on the market; that these gentlemen felt they could sell more of their product if the shingle men sold less of theirs, and have made a surreptitious and sinful effort to down a rival in the sacred name of progress. The Argonaut is not informed about this, and it is one of those matters that are hard to determine unless some of the sinful are willing to confess, which the really sinful rarely are. But aside from that, the case of shingles with which we are now about to suffer illustrates more than our method of building houses; it goes to the foundation of our method of building laws.

We have contracted the bad habit of trying to do too many things by statute. It not only clutters up the statute books with laws that can not be enforced and so have to be broken, but in the case of those that can be enforced the effect is even worse, for it tends to restrict activity and hamper that initiative of the individual from which real progress comes—and comes faster than the wisest laws conceivable by human beings could ever bring it about. A silly demand has arisen for "constructive" legislation, on the part of people who never constructed anything, who do not understand the requirements of constructing things, and who lack the vision to see that progress is going on all the time, automatically, at maximum speed, and naturally fastest where there is least to hamper it.

They want new institutions before they have learned to operate the old. They want public and private morals regulated by law instead of wholesome human disposition. Their ideal is general conformity and uniformity, whereas not even the evolution of humanity from the brute could have taken place without variation from type. They would, if they could, make a world in which it would be impossible to pick and choose, because it would offer no choice. They want all the milk delivered by the same milkman, to save overlapping of routes; and if he gave you bad milk there would be no other from whom you could get good. Under general state control, the infinite variety of life would disappear before an iron standardization, and the exercise of preference and taste, which is the thing that rewards excellence and dooms the unworthy to the ash heap (without any assistance from the infinite wisdom we elect to our legislatures), would fall into abeyance and cease to be our great stimulus of growth. For that there would be no substitute, no matter how hard an all-wise legislature and a divinely-inspired electorate might try to invent one.

In a more concrete statement of the case, we should lose what benefits there are in competition without acquiring those that come from natural monopoly. We could not change the milkman if we did not like his service. And if he knew we could not change, he would soon be giving us a service we did not like. That is true of the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, and the producer of roofing material. If the people next November should prohibit one another from using shingles they would thereby deliver themselves into the hands of the patent roofing material men. They would have cut themselves off from the competition of shingles, and would have to pay the price demanded by the makers of non-combustible roofing. And that price would rise. And it would serve them right. The value of stock in roofing concerns would grow, and the holders of it would be very grateful, and would sell it at a good profit if they had any sense, and the new owners would try to make money on their larger investment, and that would mean raising prices again, and no shingles in sight. That is the way artificial interference with the natural relations of supply and demand can be trusted to operate.

We betray no secret when we say that shingles are combustible. Everybody knows that. In some ways it would be better if all houses were built of a material that would not ignite when embers fell on it—and persons that have not had to attend big fires for a living have no idea of the size and heat of embers from a burning building and the distance to which a strong up-draft will take them. But the use of shingles is not compulsory. Those that wish to use some more expensive material are at liberty to do so. And that is of the soul of American institutions, that we shall have our choice among a number of alternatives, political, social, industrial, commercial, material and intellectual, supplied us by the enterprise of the individual members of the community. If the law prohibiting shingles should not be adopted, it is entirely possible that non-combustible roofing will in time supplant them, through voluntary choice, and in response to better prices and lower insurance rates and the reluctance of the people to have their houses burn down any oftener than they can help. But the transition should be voluntary, not compulsory; natural, not arbitrary; gradual, not abrupt and disturbing. That would be progress, and it would be real progress, which the statutory sort is not.

And further, it should be said that if a person does not wish to use shingles that is no reason why he should prohibit his neighbor from using them; which is true of things in cellars as well as things on roofs.

Concerning Coal Production.

Conditions in the coal industry are so complicated that there seems little hope of solving the problem of their efficient and equitable operation under voluntary arrangement. Competition for markets among mines of varying capacities and different situations, competition for labor in an industry vastly over-manned—these, in combination with a patchwork of restrictive laws, make a riddle something less practicable of solution than the famous fifteen puzzle. The whole business of coal production calls for scientific reorganization under a general plan designed to make the coal supply sufficient and regular and to establish working conditions equitable alike to operators and to men. The problem is not a new one. In one shape or another, it has vexed the country these twenty years or more. The present trouble at point of time runs well into a year, and yet we are no nearer an equitable adjustment than when it began.

Coal is a universal necessity, essential alike to maintenance of industry and to domestic requirement. Shortage of coal implies shortage of everything entering into the welfare of the country. In this respect coal production may be classed with transportation, which now for a good many years has been subject to governmental regulation. Is not coal production, like transportation, properly a subject of governmental oversight? The Argonaut is no friend of governmental interference with matters capable of adjustment under the principle of private initiative; but in the case of coal production it becomes evident that private initiative is not competent to the carrying on of the industry with regularity and equity all around. Private initiative has been given a long and a fair trial, even more than a fair trial, and it has not worked; and there does not seem any prospect that it may be made to work efficiently.

For the government to acquire the coal mines and to go into the business of production in all its branches is unthinkable. Under governmental ownership and operation we should have, if not the old abuses, others equally grievous or worse. The country has found that out by its brief experience of possession and control of the railroads. But government ownership and operation is one thing and governmental regulation is quite another. The principle has been worked out in connection with transportation. The situation being what it is, chronic and apparently incurable, there would seem to be necessity for applying a system, corresponding to regulation of the railroads, to the coal mines.

The mines are now being operated after an inadequate fashion under the principle of providing conditions under which "free men, willing to work, may work in safety." But the system is one of makeshift. It lacks efficiency. Likewise, it is without equity. It neither provides an adequate supply of coal at reasonable prices nor makes for justice either to the coal operatives or to the coal miners. A better system is a necessity. Is it not the duty of the government to establish rules in the coal industry, precisely as it does in regard to transportation, under which production and distribution may be carried on systematically, efficiently, and equitably? The Argonaut thinks that it is.

Nullifying Punishment.

A recital of the facts about Walter Castor raises grave doubts as to the wisdom of much recent corrective legislation; and conspicuously the parole and probation laws. Castor killed one policeman, wounded another, killed his sister-in-law who had informed on him, and then committed suicide. By all accounts he was a thoroughly bad lot, and should have reversed his programme, starting with himself. At the time, according to a newspaper account, he was at large under parole, being under sentence for manslaughter, and in addition he had been put on probation by a complacent judge in Santa Clara County, before whom he had been convicted of robbing a store at Cupertino. One would have supposed that a judge would not admit to probation a man whose record proved him a criminal, and who had just violated his parole by committing a burglary. If it had not been for the parole law Castor could not have committed the burglary, and if it had not been for the probation law he could not have killed two persons and wounded a third in this city last week. When he was convicted of robbing the store he should have been sent back to the penitentiary, there to serve his term for manslaughter—but he ought not to have been at large to commit the robbery. A person guilty of manslaughter should take his punishment. And having committed the robbery he certainly should not have been at large to commit further crimes. His activities should have stopped, at least for a long season, with the manslaughter of which he was originally convicted.

All civilized persons must sympathize more or less with the efforts of our amiable idealists to uplift humanity by reforming the wild beasts of society, and wish them what success they may achieve without jeopardizing the lives of useful persons. But when their methods and reforms prove after adoption to work out in murder, we may at least be pardoned for scrutinizing the measures that give us such results. It is hard to freshen a bad egg, and the man that goes to the penitentiary may be regarded as a bad egg in practically all cases. Letting him off easy is no more likely to reform him than making him serve his whole sentence. And it makes a hash of the administration of justice, and encourages every criminal in his criminality, to have it generally understood throughout the underworld that the law does not really mean what it says, and that a sentence pronounced today may be nullified in a few months through a little so-called good behavior—that is, not making too much trouble for the prison guards.

The probation law is often abused. The parole law likewise is often abused, and when it is, as in this case, its tendency is to make mockery of our criminal jurisprudence. Society can not safely do that. Besides, it would hardly be worth it if society could safely do it. A reformed convict is certainly worth less than the man who so governs himself that he does not need reforming. And self-government must not be permitted to become a lost art. It is still a stern individual responsibility. The Prodigal Son did not receive the right treatment. It was not just to his unprodigal brothers. He should have been suitably chastised and then set to work to earn his living. Killing a good calf for him was, in any practical sense, both injustice and folly; a beautiful exemplification of sentimentality, but not feasible if there was to be continued security and peace and justice in that family.

The parable was meant to illustrate the mercy and goodness of God. It should not be applied to the necessities of men, because their necessities can not be met that way. When a paroled convict kills an honest man, we have traded off a useful life for one of doubtful value to say the most for it; in fact, the act demonstrates that the murderer was of no value whatever. By all accounts, Detective Bailey was a useful person. He has been slain by the operation of the probation act and the parole law. Gable lies on a bed of pain a similar sacrifice to impractical idealism. It looks as if sentimentality had been permitted to go too far. We venture the opinion that no dozen of reformed criminals would ever be worth the price we have just paid.

Editorial Notes.

United States Marshal Holohan's recent conduct at Sacramento forms a sharp contrast with that of some of the reluctant and half-hearted state and county officials. Striding into a mob of strikers and demanding their attention, he denounced their conduct as un-American defiance of the government, emphasizing the fact that most of the faces around him were those of foreigners, and commanded them to disperse. It was language foreigners could understand, and they scattered. The technicalities of this particular case are of little import; the outstanding fact is that the United States Marshal has again proved that he is a man, as he did in the Hindu trial in San Francisco.

The State Housing Act has an attractive name, one suggestive of progress, reform, better living conditions for the poor, and other ameliorating influences. Because of that name, many unthinking persons will vote for it, supposing that they are thereby advancing the interests of the race. But a better designation for it is the popular one, "the shingle bill." Its prohibition of the use of shingles for roofing is its most important characteristic in its present form. It would add to the cost of dwelling construction in the midst of a housing shortage, and because of that increased capitalization it would form another resistant to the general effort to reduce the cost of living. There is better roofing material than shingles, but shingles are comparatively cheap and do very well. Although it should be said that even shingles are not so cheap as they might be.

A downright split between Great Britain and France would probably be a calamity at this juncture in world affairs, and it is a thing that ought not to occur. Lloyd George has been naturally solicitous for the relief of British unemployment through the resumption of British trade; with Russia, Germany, anybody, it matters not whom. But his policy of easing conditions for the Germans has run counter to the plain justice of the French claims for damages to cover devastations in the northeast departments of France, and he has found in Poincaré a minister just as stubborn as he is—in fact more so, for Lloyd George's main characteristic is rather flexibility than obstinacy. He can usually recognize it when he has encountered an immovable obstacle, and that seems to be what opposes him now. He should yield and preserve the entente cordiale, in the interests of something even more sacred than British exports; and it is not unlikely that he will.

A good many persons appear to have forgotten the distinction between compulsion and opportunity. Ambrose Bierce once said he had no objection to polygamy as long as it was not proposed to make it compulsory. No matter what one may think of prohibition, it can not be seriously argued that the drinking of poisonous liquor has been made obligatory on any one. Persons that blind themselves drinking bad bootleg, like those that buy flasks of cold tea and find out to their indignation that it is cold tea, and those that send to Canada for real Canadian rye at eight dollars a quart bottle and receive quart bottles filled with rye still in condition to make rye flour, are at least guilty of contributory negligence. For those who refuse to believe that wood alcohol will cause blindness there is little that can be done in the way of protection. Bootleggers should be carefully selected, if at all, but the victims do not seem capable of selection. Perhaps a clinic to certify the chemically pure might help prevent accidents.

THE TOMB OF CHARLOTTE TEMPLE.

The Shrine to Which Sentimental Maidens Took Their Woes in Little Old New York.

Little Old New York in the early part of the last century was an epitome of the unfolding life of the nation. It had its rare society, even then, and some of the dynamic characters that have made history and founded financial dynasties were in the flush of youth. Even before the war of 1812, such a man as John Jacob Astor could dream of extending the infant republic to the unknown shores of the Pacific and the lower reaches of the Columbia River, and actually dispatched a ship, and an overland party, to carry out that bold and patriotic project. At Astor's country place near Hellgate, now in the neighborhood of one of the most densely populated parts of the city, Washington Irving could meet and interview some of the survivors; and later such adventurous souls as Bonneville. Fraunces' Tavern was in its heyday, and Hamilton's light-o'-love held her sparkling court in the colonial mansion that now overlooks the Polo Grounds made famous by Babe Ruth. Men with fast horses enjoyed their "brushes" on Fifth Avenue, where today the fastest of them would only block traffic. Washington Square, where the busses start northward, was "way up town." Instead of bobbed hair and poker faces, young ladies had susceptible hearts and tender sensibilities, and curls. And when they felt a'weary of the world they went to Trinity churchyard, where Wall Street abuts against Broadway, and mourned at the grave of Charlotte Temple.

They thought of her lovely girlhood, and sighed. They reflected on her bitter disappointment, and wept. They recalled her sweetness, and their own sweet lips, innocent of the lipstick, trembled. They thought of her fortitude under her crushing load of sorrow, and sadly shook their heads, and wondered if they, under like conditions, would be equal to it. They meditated gently on their own woes, and wished they were in the grave with her. Oh, how they wished it! The cruelties of life oppressed them, and they dropped their faces in their hands and sobbed aloud. They sobbed singly and in pairs, and in triplets and quadruplets. They sat about the cold stone engraven with her lovely name and sobbed in chorus. Sometimes so many wanted to sob that they crowded one another. Sometimes the sobs synchronized, and sometimes they syncopated; you can't help that. They loosened their stays so they could sob more effectively. They strewed the petals of roses, and the pale chalices of lilies, on the limestone slab that outlined the grave and held down the heroine. They melted, they dissolved, they just let go all holts and wailed aloud, while the traffic of the heartless world that had so neglected Charlotte and was so neglecting them that their hearts were breaking, plodded up and down the old dirt road which pointed toward Albany and which some day would become the world's most celebrated avenue of haberdasheries, jazz palaces, and delicatessen stores.

It was a great emotional outlet. A maiden whose cruel father had denied her a new buggy because the old one would look well enough with a fresh coat of paint could not stamp her feet and swear at her stingy old man. They did not bring them up that way in those days. Neither could she solace herself with nicotine. Nobody can tell exactly what might have happened if a New York young lady of something less than a century ago had smoked a cigarette in a restaurant or a hotel dining-room, because it had not been tried, and no young lady of that day had the courage to try it. No comfort lay in that direction. The only protest the victim of blighted love or paternal hard-heartedness could make was to go to Charlotte's tomb and commune with her. On the north side of old Trinity and within its benign shadow, there the overburdened soul, the heart bereft of hope of happiness, could find, at least for the time, the tranquilizing influence of the grave. There never was such a place to take a disappointment in love. Charlotte would understand those mingled emotions of outraged pride, and withered hope, and vestigial affection for the unworthy object, and the longing to have him where the victim could grind his flesh with her little heels and then bind up his wounds and nurse him back to health upon her bosom. Charlotte would know and understand. Down in the damp earth some whisper would reach her in her sleep, and she would sympathize.

The time of year had something to do with it, no doubt. It must have seemed neither so necessary nor so suitable when Trinity churchyard lay under a foot or two of snow. But in the spring when mother needed help at house-cleaning, or in summer when every bird song was a poignant pain, or in the autumn when the leaves were turning sere and preparing to fall from the trees ready for pressing between the pages of albums and gift books, the mourning at Charlotte's grave was good. There were then no automobiles, there were few matinées, there were no roof gardens. Young ladies were not taught to be athletic, and to hike up mountainsides in trousers. Young men, with side whiskers, slicked their hair with Macassar oil, and it got on the high backs of the period chairs, so the young ladies embroidered antimacassars to protect the furniture, which had to last at least two generations. For them, this embroidery was about the height of indoor excitement. For outdoor sport, they were addicted to grave decoration, which could be enjoyed at Charlotte's tomb better than elsewhere.

No modern young woman would behave so. None does. Times and feelings change. The tomb is now deserted. If the typical flapper were invited to repair to the sacred spot and think about her ways and possible destiny, she would say: "Oh, chuck it. Wot do I wanna go sloppin' aroun' a graveyard for? Gimme a light an' don't talk foolish." Such a soul is not an orchid. It is a rutabaga. And perhaps it will yield more real nutriment than the orchid. Will the flapper make as good a mother as the weeper at Charlotte's tomb? Some specimens will, some won't. It all depends. Not all the weepers made good, you may be certain; not all the flappers will fail. The weeping was real serious, but it had no particular promise in it. In one sense, the public or political or social one, it was a hydraulic waste.

It was largely a matter of socialized sentiment, which is the thing that makes mobs. There was a general agreement about the tomb of Charlotte Temple. It was a good place to have a good cry, and less lonesome than crying by yourself, for others were almost sure to come, and perhaps admire your grief. Its service to the individual was as real as that of the posts put up in Scotland by the Duke of Argyle so that the oat-eating Scots might have places to scratch their backs.

But the contents of that grave were not so real. There was no Charlotte Temple under the slab. There never had been. There never was any Charlotte Temple anywhere. She was as fictitious as Thomas Bailey Aldrich's Marjorie Daw. That fane was vacant. It never contained so much as the finger-bone of the saint. It was an empty shrine. Indeed it was not even empty. It was just good solid Manhattan soil all the way down to bedrock.

Charlotte Temple was a maiden in one of those sentimental books on which the imaginations of young women in boarding-schools a century or so ago were fed. It was written by one Susanna Rowson, whose dates are 1762 and 1824, and once in awhile a copy still turns up in an old book store. It must have been one of the earliest examples of the American home-brew novel. It was a "best seller" for its day, and it had little or no competition. New York was small, there were few diversions, and the book became a rage.

About this time (exactly which time we do not definitely recall, and must refuse to furnish dates), the vestry of Trinity decided that the inscriptions on the tombstones were becoming illegible under the incessant chipping of the frost, and should be reengraved, and they set a gang of "sculptors of gravestone marbles" to deepen and sharpen the lettering, and preserve the records they held; this, according to a popular guide book to New York. They had no thought that any one would take away, still less add to, these landmarks of history. But a workman who had a light lunch and time on his hands, seeing a promising slab, amused himself by engraving it with the name of the popular heroine of the day. He made a nice job. It looked as well as any tombstone there; as dignified, as authentic, as reliable a record as there was in Trinity churchyard. To round the joke, it was well placed. And it is there yet. It illustrates the completion of the tragedy of a life that was never lived.

Thus Charlotte Temple died, who never had been born. Thus her tomb does not contain her body. Thus a figment took its place as a fact, and served as well, or even better; illuminating the dark disposition of sentimentalism to ignore the actualities of life and agonize, or even lynch a man, about nothing at all. A river of feminine sorrow has flowed above a stone that merely reserves from beneficial use enough agricultural land to make a good radish patch at the end of the world's richest and busiest thoroughfare of commerce. It is a grand exemplification of the conclusions of American sentimentality.

They say that Americans are the most numerous and emotional visitors at the tomb of Juliet, the grave of Hamlet, the pool where Ophelia drowned herself. And the Europeans accuse us of being a hard, materialistic, money-grubbing people. M. T.

Nothing would please me more than to see a renaissance of American wit and humor, writes James L. Ford in the New York Tribune, but I do not know how this is to be brought about. Committees of the sort assembled for every imaginable purpose, and which command a degree of popular respect that seems amazing to the sophisticated, are powerless in the matter. Not even in those great universities that offer elective courses in nearly everything from playwriting to plumbing is there a chair of wit and humor; and, while every variety of humbug and rascality rears its head without fear of consequences, the sword of ridicule, the only weapon of real strength in the fight against evil, is permitted to rust in its scabbard.

Claims against Williamson County, Illinois, on account of the Herrin massacres now aggregate more than $250,000.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the arctic explorer, has been given the degree of LL. D. by the University of Iowa. He is spending the summer on a lecture tour through Pennsylvania and Ohio.

The State Department has recently announced the first woman member of its foreign service in other than a clerical capacity. Miss Maud Miles of Erie, Pennsylvania, is entering the American Embassy in Tokyo as commercial attaché. Miss Miles, who has been in the State Department for some time, acted in a confidential advisory capacity for the Japanese delegation to the Arms Conference. Besides having a thorough knowledge of Japanese, French, Spanish and German, she is a student of Oriental trade conditions.

Hendrik Willem Van Loon, author of the other outline of history, "The Story of Mankind," was recently awarded the first medal ever given by the children's librarians' section of the American History Association. "The Story of Mankind" won the medal by the practically unanimous vote of a thousand children's librarians from Canada and the United States as "the most distinguished contribution to American literature for children." The medal is called the John Newberry Medal, in honor of a famous old London bookseller of the eighteenth century who is supposed to be the first librarian to give special attention to juvenile literature.

Booth Tarkington celebrated his fifty-third birthday on the 29th of July, thus marking another milestone in what he has called "the unzested fifties." His publishers remark that the fifties may lack the zest of the thirties, when success was new and hard won, but that it remained for the fifties to bring Mr. Tarkington his richest reward. Within the past year Literary Digest readers have voted Mr. Tarkington the greatest American author. De Pauw University, the foremost educational institution of his native Indiana, conferred on him an honorary degree this spring. With "Alice Adams" he won for the second time in four years the Pulitzer prize for the most distinguished novel of the year. And now the New York Times poll for the ten greatest contemporary Americans includes his name.

Mlle. Nadeja Stancioff has the distinction of being the first regularly appointed woman secretary on any diplomatic staff in Washington. Mlle. Stancioff is the daughter of the Bulgarian minister to England and is not inexperienced in diplomatic manoeuvres, as she has several times acted as chargé d'affaires for Bulgaria in London in the absence of her father. In fact she is constantly mentioned in the court register as the first lady plenipotentiary welcomed by London since the days when the great Roman monastic orders sent abbesses to court on special missions. She was secretary-interpreter at the peace conference at Genoa. Mlle. Stancioff, who is a handsome woman in her early thirties, is a proficient public speaker and has been a lecturer at the Sorbonne. She is to take charge of the Bulgarian legation here in the autumn.

D'Annunzio has a new book on the press, entitled "A Conversation in a Garden." Since his Fiume adventure the poet is said to have confined himself to his retreat near Lake Garda, his book evidently being the fruit of his solitude. The hero of Fiume has recently entertained Chicherin, the Russian envoy to Genoa, thus attracting attention anew to the sympathies which have distinguished him in the past. However, most of his former followers have scattered, though some of them occasionally look him up either to be released from their oath of allegiance or to get financial assistance. He recently wrote his legionnaires that they should accept the arrangement which made Fiume an autonomous state. D'Annunzio is not a slave to a doctrine. Neither is he an iconoclast. The past appeals to the poet as strongly as the future, and in art at least he believes in traditions. His present residence was formerly occupied by Wagner, and its owner kept it precisely as the great composer left it. The same piano stands open in the salon with the same music upon its rack. And yet Lenin once said of D'Annunzio that he was "the only true revolutionist in Italy."

Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, who died August 2d, was in his seventy-fifth year. Dr. Bell was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, March 3, 1847. He was educated in Scotland and England and on the continent. At various times throughout his life he had taken doctorate degrees in science, medicine, philosophy and law. In 1870 he went to Canada and a year later to Boston, where he became professor of vocal physiology at Boston University. The patent for the Bell telephone was granted March 17, 1876. Dr. Bell was also the inventor of the photophone, the induction balance and telephone probe for painless detection of bullets in the human body. For the latter invention he was awarded the honorary degree of M. D. by the University of Heidelberg. With C. A. Bell and Sumner Taintor he invented the graphophone in 1883. He founded and endowed in 1887 the Volta Bureau for increasing knowledge relating to the deaf, and he was also the founder of the American Association to Promote the Teaching of Speech to the Deaf. Among his many scientific monographs is a "Memoir on the Formation of a Deaf Variety of the Human Race."

Of late years Dr. Bell has divided his time between Washington, D. C., where he was a regent of the Smithsonian Institution, and Nova Scotia, where his summer home was located.

Li Yuan-Hung, who has recently been induced, much against his personal wishes, to take over the presidency of the Chinese Republic, has left his luxurious estate in the British concessions at Tientsin and returned to the discomfort of Peking and the presidency. The highest honor in the republic has gone begging for months, and Li has only accepted it for the good of his country, or perhaps because his endurance was worn down by the importunities of his statesmen. Li Yuan-Hung is fifty-eight years old and has held many positions in China, from the place of major in the cavalry to the vice-presidency and finally the presidency of the republic, to which latter post he was elected in June, 1916. General Li's family consists of himself, his wife, a son of twenty years, now attending the Peers' School in Tokyo, a daughter of twenty-two, a daughter of sixteen, and another son of twelve. General Li has always been interested in Western culture, so that it is not strange that his estate boasts a theatre of German architecture, and an Italian garden, nor that the general himself is a devotee of outdoor sports, particularly tennis and skating.

OLD FAVORITES.

Daffodils.

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,—
A host of golden daffodils
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the Milky Way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay:
Ten thousand saw I, at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced, but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
A poet could not but be gay
In such a jocund company;
I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought.

For oft, when on my couch I lie,
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.
—William Wordsworth.

The Tiger.

Tiger! Tiger! burning bright,
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies
Burned the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, and what art,
Could twist the sinews of thine heart?
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? and what dread feet?

What the hammer, what the chain?
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? what dread grasp
Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears,
And watered heaven with their tears,
Did he smile his work to see?
Did He who made the Lamb, make thee?

Tiger! Tiger! burning bright,
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?
—William Blake.

To the Cuckoo.

O blithe new-come! I have heard,
I hear thee and rejoice.
O cuckoo! shall I call thee bird,
Or but a wandering voice?

While I am lying on the grass
Thy twofold shout I hear;
From hill to hill it seems to pass,
At once far off and near.

Though babbling only to the vale
Of sunshine and of flowers,
Thou bringest unto me a tale
Of visionary hours.

Thrice welcome, darling of the spring!
Even yet thou art to me
No bird, but an invisible thing,
A voice, a mystery;

The same whom in my schoolboy days
I listened to; that cry
Which made me look a thousand ways,
In bush and tree and sky.

To seek thee did I often rove
Through woods and on the green;
And thou wert still a hope, a love;
Still longed for, never seen.

And I can listen to thee yet;
Can lie upon the plain
And listen, till I do beget
That golden time again.

O blessed bird! the earth we pace
Again appears to be
An unsubstantial, fairy place;
That is fit home for thee!
—William Wordsworth.

JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONS.

Tokutomi Slants an Oriental Glass to Catch Our Startled Reflection.

It is always interesting to see ourselves as others see us, and the poetic proverb is even more significant applied to nations than to individuals. When the nations involved in the presumably candid exchange of opinions are also involved in a diplomatic crisis of more than local and ephemeral interest and the crisis consists of nicely balancing the respective nations' faith in each other, the interest in the mirroring mentioned above noticeably accrues. We have recently been given the opportunity to see ourselves nationally as our neighbor across the Pacific sees us. Moreover, the Hon. Ichiro Tokutomi's study of "Japanese-American Relations" was supposedly not written for American consumption. Its translation into English was an afterthought, and judging from some of the comments on America, this statement is not incredible. But the less scented are these Oriental bouquets that are tossed across the sea, the less likely are we to be overpowered by dangerous fumes. Mr. Tokutomi's opinions of us are the more valuable for their lack of fulsome. And he lays the blame for our present strained relations squarely between Japan and the United States. Graphically speaking, it would fall mid-Pacific, and factually the locality mentioned is not foreign to the cause.

The average American, unversed in Japanese politics, may be surprised at Tokutomi's candor concerning a group of persons whom he designates as pro-Americans. We are prone to think of a foreign nation, particularly an Oriental one, as being in some mysterious way homogeneous—at least where Occidentals are concerned. Not so. Japan, imperialistic nation though she is, evidently did not use Prussian methods for convincing her children of the superiority of the fatherland. The present Japanese generation has been allowed to grow up with open minds and their own convictions. Here is our Japanese author's lament on the sad results of this oversight:

Should some Americans accuse Japan of being the Prussia of the Far East, our pro-Americans will admit that and say she is, indeed, a militaristic country. When they blame Japan for her expansion on the Asiatic continent, our pro-Americans will assent and say that Japan's imperialistic policy is her curse. If they talk of the great and lasting services which America has rendered to Japan in opening her up to the Western world, our pro-Americans will acknowledge that, too, saying that Perry was a great benefactor to Japan; that is why we erected him a monument. Should they boast of America as a land of justice and humanity, our pro-Americans will concur without reserve, saying that we pay profound reverence to Washington and Lincoln as the exemplary sages of modern times.

The foregoing is one of the eye-openers in a book that was presumably not intended for propaganda. It is a relief to know that the Japanese are not secretly and unanimously organized after the manner that Wallace Irwin and other anti-Japanese enthusiasts so darkly expound. If we accept "Japanese-American Relations" as a bona fide statement of the facts—and there is absolutely no reason for not doing so—it is obvious that Japan is as distressed and perplexed as we are by our tense relations and as anxious to relax. The Hon. Tokutomi even blames his fellow-countrymen for American misinterpretation of these facts:

But who is to blame if Americans have such misunderstandings about us? This responsibility rests upon both—America and Japan. On our side, we may divide those responsible in three groups: First—The so-called pro-American Japanese, who always assents to anything or everything Americans say or do. Second—Those anti-Japanese Japanese, who do not understand even their own country where they were born and reared, who look upon their own country with the eyes of a foreigner, and who take and interpret anything Japanese always from its worst aspect, and always magnify or exaggerate in their public or private utterances any fault or wrong of their own country. Third—The so-called politicians behind the scene and the military men in "the green room," who are active and bold only when they are not before the eyes of the public, and who furnish those anti-Japanese and anti-American propagandists of both countries with information or material of which they take advantage.

We have said that the Japanese publicist—he is editor-in-chief of the Kokumin Shimbun—is unsparing in his criticism of the United States. Here is where we realize Burns' fervent wish:

We do not say that Americans are a more war-like people than the people of any other country. On the other hand, we can find any evidence that they are braver defenders of liberty and humanity, nor that they are more fervent peace-lovers than any other people. Can the war of independence, the civil, and the Spanish-American wars, as quoted by President Schurman, be said to be purely and simply righteous wars, fought for the cause of justice and humanity, or not? Should we examine, in detail, the causes that brought wars, with a view of establishing historical truth, we would necessarily arrive at the conclusion that the interests of the American people constituted their fundamental, or at least very strong motives. In tracing the causes of these wars, we are certain that it would be more accurate and correct to ascribe them to economic conflicts, disrupted feelings, and national aspirations, than to the principles of liberty and humanity, as expressed by the commonplace phraseology. As to the cause of the Spanish-American war, the whole world knows very well the facts and circumstances; after instigating the rebellion in Cuba by her intrigues and using the mysterious explosion of the battleship Maine as an excuse, America resorted to arms.

And even so our Oriental critic would put some American propagandists to the blush. He not only blames the politicians of his own country for poisoning American good faith, he exonerates our nation's imperialistic tendencies even while deploring them. He says that the United States have expanded as inevitably as "the snakes crawl out of their winter abodes and go to the bushy swamps on warm springs days"—a characteristically Oriental figure. Continuing, he says:

If this be so, have the United States, as a nation, changed their original character? In other words, was America, prior to the Spanish-American war, a country of justice and humanity, and did she thereafter become an aggressive country? We know that the character of the United States has constantly been undergoing changes in regard to its relations to the external world, and we realize that, at the time of the Spanish-American war, America made a very abrupt change at one stroke. We further know that, as the United States of the past was not an angelic state, the United States of the present is not a diabolical state. In our opinion, she has only been passing through transitional stages, from the very time of her foundation down to the present, in the same way as all other states.

We note that by reason of her distant position from European countries and the absence of a powerful nation in her proximity, it has been possible for the United States to have fewer occasions to resort to arms against other countries. But for this reason alone, we should not conclude hastily that she is a peaceful nation. For a man can not start a quarrel without a second party, however he may love a quarrel, just as a man can not drink wine without having it, no matter how fond of wine he may be.

But if Tokutomi attempts always to strike an attitude of critical detachment, he does not always succeed in keeping his balance. Observe how he interprets the Panama affair and once again observe how uncouth is our reflection in the Japanese lens:

Furthermore, can we not judge from the attitude of America towards the nations of Central America how heartless she has been in sacrificing the small and weak countries for the sake of her great imperialistic ambition? We need not further dwell upon this; let us simply remember the particulars of the ingenious scheme by which she came into possession of the Panama Canal. As the territory of Panama was a part of the Republic of Colombia, the United States first made Panama an independent state, detaching her from the Colombian Republic, and as compensation for the recognition of her independence, she then obtained from Panama the permanent lease of the Canal Zone, a territory over forty miles in length and ten miles in width. Notwithstanding her previous agreement with England to make the Canal an international highway, the same as the Suez Canal, she is planning to use it exclusively for her own strategic purposes, ignoring that agreement. Can this action justly be called the conduct of an ardent peace-loving people?

One would think that we had led an army of invasion into Colombia, but as our commentator says, we need not further dwell upon this.

At last we arrive at the crucial point—the immigration problem in California. Tokutomi begins at the beginnings of things, not, of course, without emphasizing the imperialistic nature of those origins:

California, which was ceded to America by Mexico, being 158,297 square miles in area, is by more than 10,000 square miles larger than the territory of Japan, not including her colonies, the area of which is 147,555 square miles. But in our country, the population per square mile is 356, while in California it does not exceed 15.3. And taking the entire area of the United States of America, we will find that there are not more than 31 persons to each square mile. In short, our country is as congested as the steerage of a passenger ship, or like an overcrowded cattle train; but Americans have abundant space, as do the cabin passengers, moving about as they please, with plenty of room and to spare. Under such circumstances it is most natural for our nationals to emigrate to California, just as water seeks its own level; besides, there is the stepping-stone of Hawaii in between us. The men in the sugar industry in Hawaii called for the immigration of our laborers in great numbers and employed them on the plantations; and ever since the annexation of that island by the United States, the number of our nationals immigrating from that island to California has been increasing.

Note the naïveté of the argument. The area of California is ten thousand miles greater than that of Japan, its population so and so much denser, we are the nearest basin in which they may overflow, and so forth and so on. And here we beg leave to hold the mirror up to Japan. Where another nation is concerned the imperialistic policy is "heartless," the nation imperialized is victimized and "sacrificed." Where Japan herself is concerned, imperialism becomes a pious duty, and the process of expansion is as natural as water seeking its own level. "Oh wad some power the giftie gie us to see oursel's as ithers see us." Continuing on the same tack:

The agricultural products of the entire state of California are estimated at about $500,000,000, while those of the Japanese in that state are roughly estimated at $55,000,000, or 11 per cent. of the whole; the total area already under cultivation in the state is about 12,000,000 acres, and the products per acre average $42 or less, of which the Japanese have 390,000 acres under cultivation and the products per acre average $141 or more. (The data gathered in 1918.) This shows that the rate of production by the Japanese is about 350 per cent. higher than the average rate of production in the entire state. And this higher rate is the chief reason for the jealousy of their neighbors, and for the discriminations against them.

Continuing with the California question and again digging into ancient archives, Tokutomi exhumes the origin of the gentlemen's agreement. For the benefit of the few benighted who may not know that this agreement grew out of the Japanese school children segregation agitation in 1906 after the San Francisco earthquake, we reprint the following:

President Roosevelt, who was alert and had keen vision, used this incident to bring pressure upon us and to secure from us what is known as the "Gentlemen's Agreement." This was, indeed, a great diplomatic victory for America, and a signal accomplishment to the credit of Roosevelt, whose shrewdness commanded universal admiration.

Under that agreement, on the one hand, Japanese children were readmitted to the schools while, on the other hand, Japanese immigration from Hawaii into the United States was forbidden. And not only were the Japanese coming from Hawaii excluded, but the Japanese government was made to agree that it would thereafter absolutely check new immigration of its laborers to the United States.

Thereupon, the Japanese government forbade granting passports to any laborer except, first, to such immigrants who had come to Japan from the United States on a visit and were returning; second, to the parents, wives, and children of the Japanese immigrants already in America; third, to "settled agriculturists." And, at the same time, the Japanese government placed similar restrictions on the emigration of our people for Hawaii. This is, indeed, the so-called "Gentlemen's Agreement," concluded in 1907, between Secretary Root, on behalf of the government of the United States, and Ambassador Takahira, on behalf of Japan.

As every one knows, the gentlemen's agreement, despite its suave name, was not sufficient lubricant for American-Japanese friction. Our author rather bitterly expresses himself:

Nevertheless, the anti-Japanese cry grew louder and louder, and the Japanese government endeavored to win the good-will of Americans. To meet what was called the public agitation in America, the government officials and the people of Japan did everything that possibly could be done to allay the anti-Japanese sentiment there. Such an instance may be seen in the fact that in 1915, when the Panama-Pacific International Exposition was held in San Francisco, Japan took the lead in accepting America's invitation.

But the intensity of the anti-Japanese feeling did not abate any. As previously stated, during the period of 1911 and 1915, approximately fifty-one anti-Japanese bills were introduced in the assembly of California; can we not infer from this how stubborn anti-Japanese agitation was? And in May, 1913, the Alien Land Law bill was passed in the California assembly. This bill provides that aliens eligible to become citizens of the United States may acquire the title to, or own, or transfer, or utilize, or inherit, real property, while aliens ineligible to citizenship were limited only to their leasing land for farming purposes for a period of not more than three years. To explain in the concrete, it made it absolutely impossible for the Japanese to own land, and in addition thereto, it limited their leases to a period not to exceed three years.

There are two sides to every question and it is undeniably interesting and valuable to get the Japanese viewpoint on this one. It is worth while, too, to know that they have earnestly labored to get ours. Referring to the time of the passing of the Alien Land Law, Tokutomi says:

At that time Viscount Makino, the minister of foreign affairs of Japan, asked Viscount Bryce, scholarly statesman and an authority on America, who happened to be visiting Japan, for his opinion about this matter, and Bryce advised him to rely on America, as the sense of justice of Americans was so keen that they would ultimately do what was right. Minister Makino, talking to others, said that this was just the principle and spirit which governed our attitude towards America. (See "Japan and the Gentlemen's Agreement," by Dr. Sidney Gulick.) We do not know whether this conversation actually took place or not, but while our trust in America was sincere, with what keen sense of justice have Americans repaid us in return for our trust, and how long are we to keep on trusting?

In conclusion, in a chapter labeled "What Will Be the Result of the Complication Between Japan and America," our author sums up:

We are quite tired of hearing the abusive words or the venomous utterances of the so-called anti-Japanese people. But there are also those in America who are pro-Japanese. Now let us listen to some of the views in that quarter. Charles Sherrill, one of the pro-Japanese in the Republican party, who is likely to become resident ambassador to Japan, in the event that this party accedes to political power, visited the country and made careful observation of her condition, and after returning to America he made the following statement as a plan for promoting the friendly relations between Japan and America:

"First—Japan to prevent her people in the Pacific Coast states from competition with the white laborers by gradually diminishing their number.

"Second—Japan to restrain the evil tendency of the immigrants who try to Japanize Hawaii—not only in its customs, but even in its ideas.

"Third—Japan to renounce the acquired rights of the Caroline and Mariana archipelagoes.

"Fourth—Japan to continue the embargo on 'Picture Marriages' of the Japanese in America.

"Fifth—Japan to close up the Japanese primary schools in Hawaii, and at the same time to recall to Japan her subjects who persist in fostering their mother tongue, customs, and loyalty to the imperial house.

"Sixth—Japan to permanently discontinue all her designs relative to the Philippines."

This, to be sure, is a very convenient view of a pro-Japanese American favoring America. It is said that there are two schools in America—the anti- and the pro-Japanese, and that the influence of the pro-Japanese by far surpasses that of the anti-Japanese. We do not know whether this is the case or not. But let us concede it for a moment—an ample concession indeed—and yet we shall have to come to the conclusion that both the anti- and the pro-Japanese do not differ much in their fundamentals. Both aim at bottling up Japan. The only little difference we can discern between them is in their methods—the one is harsh and the other moderate. If we examine into the substance of their activities, we will find that both are alike, and the differences are only in degrees and not in kinds. And do not views like the above confirm the similarity?

Probably the foregoing is the most significant disquisition in Mr. Tokutomi's book. Remember it was written for native consumption and enlightenment and his conclusion, distinctly anxious though it is—and it is significant that the better element in Japan are as anxious as ours for a peaceful status quo—it is also distinctly less tolerant than his beginning. It is perhaps not amiss to call attention to the fact so impatiently emphasized by our foreign critic that of the six compromises suggested by the pro-Japanese Mr. Sherrill, six of them are to the effect that Japan must concede something or other. At this point we are in Mr. Tokutomi's boat. We can only leave the question of our international relations in the laps of the gods.

JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONS. By the Hon. Ichiro Tokutomi. Translated by Sukeshige Yanagiwara. New York: The Macmillan Company.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending August 5, 1922, were $148,200,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $124,000,000; an increase of $24,200,000.

The stock market the past month has followed the usual tactics of a summer accumulation prior to a resumption of activities in the future. There has been plenty of un-strength throughout the past month and occupied a place of first importance in the transactions on the Stock Exchange. Such issues as the Pennsylvania, New York Central, Union Pacific, Chicago and Northwestern, Illinois Central, Northern Pacific, Great Northern, Atchison and Southern Pacific and others of a similar character, were carried to new high levels for the year on a wave of buying that centered on the railroad shares.

The advance in the rail stocks was accompanied by an upturn in rail bonds of both investment and speculative type, the investment stocks being the chief factors. The strength shown by railroad stocks and bonds, regardless of the threatening aspects of the strike situation, shows that the general public as well as the trade, confidently expect our government to preserve law and order in any crisis that may arise, and that under no circumstances will a fractional part of the people of this country be allowed to prevent the free movement of traffic over our railroads.

Earnings are improving and car-loadings increasing with every indication that when the labor troubles are settled, as they undoubtedly will be in the near future, there will be a large increase in traffic on account of improved business conditions and abundant crop returns that will result in increased earnings. The tonnage of the railroads serving the Northwestern grain-growing states during the past month was nearly 20 per cent greater than during the corresponding period last year, in spite of strikes and other annoying conditions, and they now have the biggest tonnage in sight to handle that they have had for several years.

The outlook is equally favorable for all of the lines handling Pacific Coast traffic, as shown by their statements of June earnings, and the reports of business now in sight, which exceeds that of any previous season.

The extent of business recovery in the United States is shown by the National Bank of Commerce in New York in the August number of its magazine, Commerce Monthly, by a comparison of trade and production statistics since the first of the year with corresponding periods in 1921.

"While it is generally recognized that business has steadily improved for some months, the extent of the progress achieved becomes apparent only when comparison is made between periods of reasonable length," Commerce Monthly says. "Those cases where the 1922 figures are below those for 1921 were for the most part affected by special circumstances. Thus the value of exports for the first half of 1922 is considerably lower than for 1921, but this is largely a reflection of price changes. Wheat exports are little more than half of those of the previous period—largely because of the extremely rapid movement of grain in the fall of 1921. Exports of pork products are somewhat smaller than for the corresponding period of last year.

"In contrast with these losses, carloadings, exclusive of coal, are more than 11 per cent. above the previous period, pig-iron production is nearly 28 per cent. higher, and steel ingot production 50 per cent. higher. Building contracts are up nearly 60 per cent. Cotton consumption for the half-year was 18 per cent. greater than for the first half of 1921.

"In connection with the situation in the United States, it is of interest to note that exports of cotton piece goods from the United Kingdom for the first five months of 1922 were 1,538,953,000 square yards compared with 1,058,382,000 square yards during the first five months of 1921, and British exports of woolen and worsted goods were 72,865,600 square yards, compared with 51,207,200 square yards for the corresponding period of the preceding year. Textiles constitute the most important class of British exports of manufactures, and the notable gains made clearly indicate better conditions, not only in the United Kingdom, but in the countries to which British textile manufacturers sell."

Carloadings for the first six months of 1922 totaled 20,248,000 cars, compared with 18,686,000 in the first half of last year. New capital issues to May 31, 1922, were $2,627,- 648,000, an increase of $769,974,000 over the same period last year. Bank debits to individual accounts, another index of business activity, were $223,696,135,000 on June 28th, an increase of $20,596,731,000 over the same period last year. New York bank clearings reached $109,440,844,000 on June 30th, or $11,424,697,000 more than the first half of 1921.

From statistics which are available in the files of the Wisconsin state railroad commission, it is plain that there has been a marked trend away from municipal operation of utility properties to operation by privately-owned companies. Records made public by the Wisconsin commission show that from 1915 to the present time some 17 municipally-owned plants have been sold to private companies. During the same period, according to the commission, seven new plants were set up by municipalities and 16 were taken over by cities. Of this total 15 of the plants which are mentioned buy electric current from private utilities and do more than distribute electrical energy, says Cleveland Topics.

The trend, even among the municipalities themselves, has been to junk a large percentage of their own generating stations and buy their electric energy from private companies. In other words, municipalities have found it cheaper to stop the generation of energy themselves when they find it impossible under certain circumstances to compete with the big central stations.

In 1915, according to the records, 79 cities generated their own electrical energy, while at present there are only about 30 doing this. Last year statistics show that 28 plants owned by different cities bought their energy from private companies. At the present time the total of municipal plants buying energy from central stations or privately-owned companies is nearly 70.

Yet in the face of our own experience with government operation of railroads, ships, and war industries, progressive radicals in California propose to bond the state at the next election for $500,000,000 for state ownership and control of power resources.

Think of the political pie that would be passed around. The proponents of this demoralizing act object to being told they are following Russia's lead in destroying industries.

If this act is passed in California it will retard investment of capital in all Western states for fear of spread of the experiment to other sections, with resulting disregard of thousands of investors' rights.

Physical separation of the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific after fifty-two years of unified management and control is as senseless a proceeding as splitting a growing tree down the centre, tearing the roots in half, and expecting the result to be two equally strong trees, says the Industrial Review.

The Southern Pacific and Central Pacific remind one of an old pioneer couple who settled in the West in the early days.

Full legal formality was often lacking in many transactions during that period, but the spirit and intent of an act carried more weight than the technical letter of the law.

The old Southern Pacific and Central Pacific may be likened to such a pioneer and his wife. They developed together and were wedded by force of circumstances.

Enforced legal separation for an act completed many years before the passage of legislation enacted at a later period to correct evils which had no existence in the case in question can serve no good purpose at this time.

That attractive socialistic writer, Arthur Brisbane, "told the world" a few days ago that there would be no strikes, no labor troubles even, if the people managed public utilities, made them their own, "managed them for their own convenience and profit, as they should do." One is permitted to remind this dreamer of dreams that whatever he may imagine "would be" the case, there have been even under these ideal conditions troubles of a disturbing nature, say Strassburger & Co. in the Review. Admittedly, however, only in those rare instances when the public management has dared to set a limit to the demands of its nominal subordinates. These demands do not necessarily take the form of insistence on a disproportionate wage scale, except in so far as any wage may be regarded as excessive for a certain kind of service. The privilege expected—and usually conceded as a matter of course—is the liberty to loaf. Those of us who have lost time and temper unraveling the red tape of officialdom, subjected during the process to veiled exhibitions of resentment at our interference with the proper enjoyment of newspaper and cigar, need no confirmation of the charge. The truth, known to all, is that men do not work for government, state, or municipality in the same spirit as they do for private employers. There is not the same incentive, negative or positive. Risk of dismissal is too remote to exercise any influence, the voting power takes care of that. Promotion is not, as a rule, to be gained by greater application. Favoritism and political service take a man further than any amount of diligence.

The atmosphere of a public office is charged with a poison that has to be felt to be understood. Any man who has worked in both private and publicly conducted businesses has experienced this, will tell you that in the latter he has experienced the gradual overcoming of his energy and ambition by a kind of miasma that infects him with nausea when confronted with a task that had to be accomplished at once. Sooner or later "Tomorrow" is installed on the highest throne in his temple of worship.

Herein lies the danger of any such interference with the conduct of our public utilities as is contemplated by the misnamed "California Water and Power Act." The inevitable results are to be found in Ontario, in Los Angeles—wherever the palsied hand of government in business holds the wheel. Ineffavorable news in connection with both the coal and railroad strikes and the cut in crude oil prices to frighten the timid holder into running away from the long side, while at the same time there was an element of strong interests which stepped in and took all stocks offered and thus placed the market in a strong position, say E. iciency, extravagance, dishonest systems of accounting, camouflaging the public, corruption of every kind, are a few only of the evils we invite if we yield to the frenzied appeal—"Power at Cost."

The people of California never have been called upon to decide in an election a question of greater importance to themselves than that of the so-called Water and Power Act which is to be voted upon in November. Because of its possibilities for evil to our welfare and prosperity, no voter having the interests of the state at heart can afford to remain indifferent to the scheme nor to ignore his duty of getting ready to vote against it, says the Oakland Bank in its monthly letter. The act proposes the creation by constitutional enactment of a super-government of five persons appointed by the governor. The members of this board would be removable only by recall or by the vote of two-thirds of both houses of the legislature. Authority is conferred upon the board by the act to issue $500,000,000 of state bonds and to devote the money as it pleases in unspecified ventures in hydro-electric development and other incidental business. Setting aside any other consideration of this proposal, the present commitments of the taxpayers of California are such that they can not lightly entertain the prospect of taking on an additional burden such as inevitably would be added under the workings of this act. California today has more bonds outstanding than any state except Massachusetts and New York. With the bonds provided for in this act, California would have about 45 per cent. of the aggregate debt of all the states in the Union. Totalling the percent bonded debts of the state, its counties and municipalities, we find that it was $321,616,238 on June 30, 1921, as compared with $288,510,608 on June 30, 1920, and $93,906,423 on June 30, 1911. During the last ten years the total bonded debt for all forms of government in the state has increased 242 per cent., while in the same period the wealth of the state increased only about 60 per cent. Meeting the interest and sinking fund requirements of our present aggregate bonded indebtedness is already a sufficiently heavy load for the people to carry. Prosperous though we may be, and bountiful as are the resources of the state, we are yet far from attaining such a surplus of wealth that we may abandon discretion and give our indorsement to any untried scheme that idealists may seek to foist upon us. Why the people of California should be asked to project themselves into an experiment of this character is hard to understand when the conditions now prevailing here in the hydro-electric field are compared with those of other sections of the country. According to the California State Railroad Commission, the average rate in California in cost to the consumer is 1.42 cents per kilowatt hour. The rate in New England states is 2.82 cents, in the South Central states 2.65 cents, the Atlantic states 2.09 cents and North Central states 1.82 cents. We in this state are paying an average rate less than that charged anywhere else in the nation; we have created by law a commission whose jurisdiction it is to see that these charges shall be just and reasonable, and yet we are asked to create another political board, endow it with almost unlimited power and abundant funds, and give it a roving commission to build hydro-electric plants where it will, so that the people of certain favored sections in the state may get power at cost. And no one can say what that cost will be. Other government enterprises of a similar nature have failed to justify the hopes which led to their creation, as witness the New York traction muddle, the Erie Canal and the Ontario power project, the latter being the model, we are told, for our own proposed venture, and yet the charge is made by Premier Drury of Ontario that power which was sold by a private company at from $15 to $17 a horsepower year is being sold now by the government power commission for $21 a horsepower year, and in addition the commission is piling up a yearly deficit of $300,000.

The experience invariably has been that when government projects its activities into business an increased burden of taxation results to the people, and with so many examples of inefficiency and failure of government in business before us, it is hardly likely that the voters of California will invite disaster by giving approval to this ill-conceived measure.

The California Car Company is offering $250,000 8 per cent. cumulative preferred capital stock, redeemable after five years at 105. Preferred stock carrying preference both as to earnings and assets is now purchasable at par with bonus of common stock--non-assessable and exempt from normal Federal income tax.

From a letter written by A. D. Bowen, president California Car Company:

"The California Car Company is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California.

"The purpose of the company is to supply for profit the demand which exists on the part of the steam railroads for a passenger-carrying unit that will enable the railways to compete effectively with automobile passenger carriers.

"The A. D. Bowen Model C Railway Car is an adaptation of the gasoline engine to the requirements of railway operation by means of which the railroads are enabled to give frequency of service equal to that given by bus lines and at a lower cost.

"The cost per mile of operating a Bowen Model C car is 14 cents--about one-half the cost per mile of operating a large size motor bus, or about one-tenth the cost per mile of operating a locomotive with a passenger coach. "Model C will speedily revolutionize the railway business in the handling of short-haul passenger traffic. It will enable their owners to operate at a profit thousands of miles of branch line and short line railways that now are being operated at a loss."

Schwabacher & Co. are offering $120,000 Paradise Valley Irrigation District, Blaine County, Montana, serial 6 per cent. bonds, payable serially from December 15, 1927, to December 15, 1946. These bonds constitute a lien ranking ahead of first mortgages, including those held by Federal land banks and are free from Federal income tax. The interest and principal of these bonds are payable from taxes levied and collected by the county officials of Blaine County. State, county, and school district taxes may not be paid, nor will not be accepted by the county treasurer, except the taxpayer include his irrigation district taxes therewith.

The Paradise Valley Irrigation District is situated in the Milk River Valley, Blaine County, Montana, near the city of Chinook, obtaining its abundant water supply for irrigation by direct gravity flow from the Milk River. The valley has an area of 11,584 acres; 100 per cent. irrigable; 90 per cent. now in crop. The total debt is $120,000, or only $10.35 per acre.

Mitchum, Tully & Co. report that for the first six months of the current year United Drug Company earnings, after depreciation and taxes, amounted to $1,678,000. This is an increase of $487,000 over figures for the corresponding period of 1921. 1922 earnings are at the rate of substantially better than two and three-fourths times the interest on funded debt.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $220,000 San Gabriel Water District (Los Angeles County, California) 5 per cent. gold bonds, exempt from all Federal income taxes and from California personal property taxes, maturing from February 1, 1926, annually to February 1, 1949.

These bonds are a direct obligation of the San Gabriel Water District, organized under the County Water Works District Act of California, for the purpose of acquiring from private interests the systems which now serve water to the city of San Gabriel for domestic purposes, and to the agricultural tracts adjoining for both domestic and irrigation purposes.

The city of San Gabriel (sixth class) is situated about ten miles from Los Angeles, five miles from Pasadena, and adjoins on the east the city of Alhambra. Transportation is provided by the Southern Pacific and Pacific Electric systems, and by a network of hard-surfaced roads communicating with the adjoining cities. It is one of the oldest communities in the state, dating back to the Mission, which was founded in 1771.

The San Gabriel Water District, including the territory in the city, embraces a total of 2050 acres of highly-developed orchard and garden land, and will be extended to include an additional 480 acres, the owners of which have applied for admission. The territory surrounding the city of San Gabriel is one of acre and half-acre garden tracts, producing oranges, lemons, vegetables and poultry.

In the opinion of counsel these bonds constitute a direct obligation of the San Gabriel Water District, with an unlimited power of general taxation upon all taxable property in the district. The bonds are additionally secured by the pledge of revenues derived from the operation of the water system.

Reduced one-way passenger fares from California points to New York by Southern Pacific rail lines to New Orleans and thence by Southern Pacific steamship lines to New York have been announced by the Southern Pacific Company to become effective August 25th. The new rates of $100.20 and $91.20 will apply to second cabin and steerage accommodations from New Orleans. The present one-way fare of $109.20 including first-class steamer accommodations is unaffected. The fares quoted include berths and meals aboard ship.

American investors are steadily buying more and more foreign securities and the United States has succeeded England as the world centre for investment capital, says World's Work.

This is an encouraging development from a national viewpoint, for only by increasing our investments abroad can we increase our exports of goods to foreign countries. The money that we lend is largely converted into goods here and it is the goods that we export. Thus foreign loans engage American capital and American labor at home. Before the war we were Europe's debtor and sent goods in payment of our debts, our capital and labor being employed in the production of them; now that we are a creditor nation we either must loan money abroad or take back more goods than we send out.

The position that we now hold in world finance, which has this relationship to foreign trade, is the position that Great Britain has held for a hundred years since the Napoleonic wars. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the English people have taken some steps in foreign investment. But the industrial revolution of the eighteenth century created a demand for capital at home with which to buy machinery, build factories, and develop coal mines, and prolonged wars forced the British government to borrow heavily at home and abroad. Dutch capitalists took advantage of this situation to invest at high rates of interest in British securities and British commercial and industrial enterprises. Amsterdam was then the chief financial centre of the world. Great Britain was still a borrowing nation at the end of the eighteenth century.

With the Napoleonic wars, however, came a change. A historian says of this period: "At the end of the war the industrial capacity of England had been expanded, a sizeable merchant marine had been built, and the people had learned how to save money. There began immediately a rapid development of English foreign investment. Carried forward by the same spirit which had enabled them to overcome Napoleon, the people of the British Isles took the utmost advantage of their expanded productive capacity and of their experience in saving and investing. Important loans were made to the continental countries which had suffered the most from the long years of war, and foreign holdings of British bonds and stocks were bought back from the Dutch and others."

Then began the great expansion of England's foreign trade which continued almost without interruption up to the recent war. There followed the extension of British investments into South America, into French and Belgian railway securities, into canal, railway, and government bonds of this country. The rapid extension of our highways of transportation in the '50s and '60s would not have been possible without the aid of the savings of English investors. Their investments also extended to the British colonies, to South Africa, to the Far East, and helped in the development of those countries. On the London Stock Exchange today there is a greater number of foreign and colonial securities than domestic issues.

The world war has given to us the opportunities that the Napoleonic wars gave to England. It has brought to us a third of the world's gold supply and has made us the great reservoir of capital and credit. Although efforts to stimulate foreign financing by establishment of great financing organizations have largely failed, yet the American investor, and largely the small investor, acting individually, is now absorbing a large amount of foreign securities and is helping to solve the problem of our international future. Last year he took 784 million dollars' worth of foreign securities and in the first four months of this year he took 524 million dollars' worth. It is expected that by the end of this year American investors will have $600,000,000 invested in South American government issues alone.

One of the recent developments has been the offering of foreign railroad bonds and industrial bonds in this country. Such offerings have a more direct bearing on our foreign trade than the government issues. In undeveloped countries such loans return to the lending country many fold the amount of capital involved. Sir George Paish estimated that the foreign capital invested in this country bore fruit in an increase in annual production of wealth of at least twenty times the amount we paid in interest. This increase in wealth meant increased buying power and greater demand for the products of the lending countries that returned to them much more than the interest they received on the loans. Better than tariff protection, which increases prices and restricts foreign markets, is investment abroad, which extends markets and keeps the balance of trade in our favor.

The individual investor, however, does not buy foreign securities in order to extend our trade, and should not. It would be well for him as an individual to study the experience of English investors in this matter. While there is no question that its foreign investments have paid Great Britain well, especially those that have gone into the most risky enterprises in their development stages, yet a large amount of these foreign securities are not now paying their interest and individual investors have therefore lost money in them. It would be well for Americans who are buying foreign securities to study the reports of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders, a British organization for the protection of the interests of foreign security holders, which compiles elaborate records regarding the economic and financial conditions of the various states with whose bonds it has had occasion to deal on account of defaults or other developments affecting the interests of British holders. This organization reports the astounding fact that of all foreign government bond issues floated at various times in the English market almost nine billion dollars' worth are now in default as to principal and the arrears of interest amount to more than two billion dollars.

We know also that French investments in Russia, including both government and private loans made before the revolution, totaled more than four billion dollars. The lesson from this for the American investor in foreign securities is that he should diversify his selections among them. He will continue to be attracted to these issues by the high yields they offer, and it is well for the country that he should, but he should distribute his risk among them. By buying them on the recommendation of investment houses that enjoy the best reputations for conservatism and by well diversifying his selection of them he is not likely to regret his entrance into the foreign investment field.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Joseph Hergesheimer's "Cytherea" is, you might say, a rather complete recital of the secret reflections passing through the depressed mentality of a man who has reached "the dangerous age." To be sure, the author of "Dangerous Ages" made all ages dangerous. But the fact is that there comes a time in men's and women's lives when they realize that youth has gone, or nearly gone. And with the realization, since age has not yet come, the less balanced characters sometimes make an incautious grasp for their departed joys.

This is what Lee Randon did, and abruptly ran into tragedy. The recital does not lend itself to picturization, since the major part of the book is taken up with Lee Randon's secret reflections. They are, generally speaking, to the effect that we who have built up this twentieth-century civilization are all hypocrites; that our rules, our conventions, our pretended beliefs are hypocritical; and that marital constancy is a myth.

Of course fiction and truth—as told in the daily press—seem to bear him out. Many a man has abruptly said to his wife, "I don't love you any more. I'm going to get out." And he gets. Many a trusting husband has returned at night to the marital nest, only to find that his fair inconstant has unexpectedly fled with a secret and unsuspected lover.

The constant ones, of course, reprobate the fickle ones fiercely; and indeed it is one of the great tragedies of living that two in love do not unlove simultaneously. And it remains one of the beautiful and hopeful human traits that out of the fever of young love there often develops a beautiful and constant affection that causes a pair of married lovers to be willingly dependent on each other for happiness, sympathy, and companionship during a lifetime.

This, however, is a state that does not interest our young fictionists of the present day. And the author of "Cytherea" has made it his task, in his novel, to arraign the institution of marriage, not because it is lasting, since there is the divorce court, but because, when the affection of one of a pair has faded and died, he or she is still held in bondage by public opinion, and sometimes by the obligations of parenthood.

Perhaps it should be said that Lee Randon rather than Joseph Hergesheimer arraigns the institution of marriage, as it seems to be the author's purpose partly to let us into the surge of reflections passing through the mind of a man whose affection for a still young, good, constant and attractive wife has suddenly died; and partly to see how it works out when the husband evades his responsibilities and incontinently departs.

This part of the story, however, the author does not follow up completely, as he becomes interested in presenting the character of the woman—one of the queens and ornaments of New York society—who supplants the forsaken wife.

Mr. Hergesheimer has sometimes shown a strain and effort to achieve his effects. He has written "Cytherea" very carefully, very thoughtfully, but it looks somewhat as if the man of business as well as the artist was influencing him when he decided to be so daring. No doubt he said to himself that American fiction-readers had become so inured to candor that he could go further lengths than ever before, and that he would make "Cytherea" the sort of thing people would talk about in whispers.

In this he has succeeded, and in doing so has somewhat passed the bounds of literary reticence in his depiction of the salient feature in Savina Grove's character.

A curious feature of the book is a certain element of heartlessness in it. The affectional impulses seem missing in all the characters save Fanny, the wife, and even she belongs to that class of conservative woman whose principal feeling toward the husband is the pride of ownership and the instinct of possession.

Savina, too, is all instinct, Lee a mixture of instinct and reflectiveness, his long, profound meditations seeming to place him in a peculiarly lonely, detached position with regard to his associates, who take life as it comes, gayly, unthinkingly, and, when they sin, sin in secret, while outwardly they conform.

And that is Lee's great indictment against society; and, probably, Joseph Hergesheimer's.

And the novelist, in following up the sudden and hectic love between Savina and Lee, fails to pursue it to its logical conclusion, death being invoked to sever the new and so passionately cemented bond.

Whether or not this is an evasion is not quite apparent. Probably not.

"Cytherea" would seem to be the tilting of a lance for a cause advocated by several of the leading literati of England, some twenty years ago. The idea was tentatively advanced that marriage should be regarded, and entered upon, as a ten years' experiment, to be terminated at the end of the period if either of the contracting parties so desired.

But in England! conservative England, of all places, where even divorce is so rigidly restricted that novels and plays take up the theme of legal injustice in respect to severing bonds between marital partners united to madmen or criminals. A wave of utter and overwhelming reprobation swept over the right little, tight little isle, and the reckless pioneers faded away into a dark background.

And now radical youth, impatient of restriction, is quite apt to take up the question again. Which is really rather foolish, in view of the fact that in this country marriage is no longer "til death do us part." The only burning point nowadays is property. And, since women have entered the industrial world in overwhelming numbers, in time, no doubt, the law will be changed about giving alimony to young and husky females able to earn a living, unless they have borne children to the deserted or deserting spouse.

The whole question is exceedingly interesting. At present the women have the inside track, and they will keep it as long as they can, with the aid of public opinion and male chivalry. For, suppose the ten-year scheme had worked, it would be largely for the benefit of the men, who would immediately seek more youthful partners, while the ex-wife, her youthful bloom somewhat lessened by a ten years' experience in domestic adjustment, would be at a disadvantage.

What a shame that we can not insure ourselves a visit to the earth a hundred or two or five hundred years after death, and see how the old world and the inhabitants thereof are wagging along in respect to this and numerous other social questions.

Nothing is so foolish as to confuse an author's views with those of his characters. Perhaps Mr. Hergesheimer's intention was merely to give a mental picture of the reflections of a husband longing for release, but nearly all the young fictionists of the day are radical, so why not he? There is a lot of yeast working in the minds of the present generation, some of it merely froth, some a leaven that will work for future regeneration. But so far no one has suggested or advanced any improvement on the institution of marriage, as it exists in our America today, with its alleviation or cure—when it suffers an angry and dangerous inflammation—of legal separation or divorce.

Notes of Books and Authors.

James Joyce, the curious Irish writer who lives in Paris and writes the most amazing novels, was once a teacher of English in the Berlitz school at Trieste. His small son is such an enthusiastic Irish Nationalist that he refused to be taught to speak English.

E. M. Hull, the probably fabulously wealthy author of "The Sheik," is publishing a new novel, "The Shadow of the East" (Small, Maynard & Co.). Though the publication date is set for August 2d, three large advance printings have already been exhausted. "The Sheik" has reached its eightieth printing.

Philip Merivale, the well-known English actor and author, whose play, "Knut at Roskilde," has just been published by the Four Seas Company, is playing the part of Will Shakespeare in Clemence Dane's play about the great Elizabethan. Mr. Merivale will return to the United States in the fall with a Belasco production.

Harper Brothers have recently published their new descriptive catalogue, containing more than three thousand titles and being a veritable history of the famous publishing house, which is moving from the building it has occupied in Franklin Square for more than a hundred years. The first book published by the Harpers was Seneca's "Morals," in 1817.

The Princeton University Press reports that interest in the two Herman Melville books—one of prose and one of poetry—to be published by them this fall continues to grow. Inquiries are pouring in from individuals and stores all over the country. In addition to the regular edition there will be a special limited edition of 150 copies each, on handmade paper, each copy numbered.

Little, Brown & Co. report that their deluxe three-volume book, "The Supreme Court in United States History," has already attained its second printing. The rapid sale in a few weeks of an eighteen-dollar work on a rather abstract subject is indicative of change and development in the book-buying public. The publishers say that a few years ago such a book would have been dubbed high brow and ignored except in restricted circles.

Lord Charnwood, author of "The Life of Abraham Lincoln," is now writing "The Life of President Roosevelt."

Laurence Binyon, whose "Selected Poems" has recently been published by the Macmillan Company, says that he has never belonged to any special group of poets. Mr. Binyon is in charge of the Oriental prints and drawings at the British Museum. He writes: "Being

A biographical and critical study of "Edward MacDowell," bearing the sub-title, "A Great American Tone Poet: His Life and Music," is announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co. It is the work of John F. Porte, whose two volumes on "Sir Edward Elgar" and "Sir Charles V. Stanford," both published by the Duttons, are known to lovers of music as biographical and critical studies that are comprehensive and sincere. The forthcoming volume will have a frontispiece portrait of Edward MacDowell and the text will contain many musical illustrations.

Before man can be free, and equal, and truly wise, he must cast aside the chains of habit and superstition; he must strip sensuality of its pomp, and selfishness of its excuses, and contemplate actions and objects as they really are.—Shelley.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Confessions of a Well-Meaning Woman.

Stephen McKenna has tried something entirely new in a novel form for his "Confessions of a Well-Meaning Woman." The novel that is a diary is, alas, only too familiar, and Mr. McKenna's "Confessions" have all the vices of the journal of monotony and restriction. But it is interesting waiting to see if the author can carry on and develop a story from what in themselves are a series of monotonous monologues. After a chapter or two one is apt to think he has arrived at satiety, for though Lady Anne's discursiveness is true to life and as large as life, it is rather too much for a steady diet. By the time you have decided that Lady Anne not only has the floor, but is going to continue to have it unchecked by any form of rebuttal, you feel that Mr. McKenna has really neglected the Greek proverb not to run things into the ground. But if your love of satire is sufficient to make the grade you will discover a new interest in piecing together the different patches of the story, puzzle fashion. This novel method of exposition, plus a mordant piece of satire on middle age, are Mr. McKenna's present contributions to literature. There is something to be said for the new method—it is efficient. It enables one to skip nonchalantly about, reading backwards if one wishes. It doesn't matter, since the reader must construct his own picture puzzle anyway. Perhaps Mr. McKenna has started something.

The Case of Sir Edward Talbot.

Omniscience, omnipotence, and immortality have always been fascinating subjects for the speculation of impotent and mortal humanity. Marlowe capitalized the idea with Dr. Faustus, but we may be sure he was not the first. The theme is certainly as old as alchemy, probably as imagination. Today Shaw and the gland transmitters are engaged with one part of the ancient heritage while the spiritualists take over the rest. It was a happy idea to utilize the drive behind the sempiternal aim of man and chain it to a mystery story with the almost certain result of throwing any ordinary mystery story laden with less occult horrors—and they are, after all, the only real horrors—hors de combat. Valentine Goldie, whom we are unfortunately unable to refer to by a pronoun, as we do not know and can not guess his or her sex, has had the bright inspiration and used it in "The Case of Sir Edward Talbot," which is cleverly saved from any imputation of being occult propaganda by its wholesome and cynical atmosphere. Only a writer capable of creating the delightful Joyce Cassilis could successfully keep the balance between heavy and supernatural horrors and conventional and cheerful skepticism. This feat alone is remarkable in a yarn which is extraordinarily imaginative even in its barest outlines. In addition the author is a clever sketcher of society characters and has a very racy humor. Altogether a most satisfactory mystery story.

Ascent.

Novels by women seem to preponderate. In fact so general is the lady novelist that she is almost synonymous with the novelist in the present era. But though fiction has become practically a feminine institution, it does not follow that it is the peculiar habitat of the feminine writer. She has her rights there, but one may be pardoned for regretting the passing of the virile novel. There is a certain characteristic about fiction by women that holds good in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred and which the book listed above admirably illustrates. "Ascent," like the multitude of other products of the lady novelist, is marked by the total absence of gusto and anything resembling the joy of living. Whether or not it is true that women never experience any élan in life or whether only the disappointed take to literature, the fact remains that their accomplishment in the major field of fiction is remarkable for its sombreness. It would make an interesting thesis for a master's or a doctor's degree in literature. We venture to say our observation would be borne out by close research.

The reason for rather unkindly picking on "Ascent" as an excuse for exploiting our newly-discovered law is that it so beautifully illustrates the point. "Ascent" is the story of a woman's search for what may be pardonably called the joie de vivre, since her search took place in Paris. It is a remarkable story and there is a great deal more to it than its abstract thesis—it is in a dignified style, a little marred by preciosity—but the aptness of its theme is its outstanding feature. Even a hard, egotistic woman, such as Olive Devon, it seems, is doomed to everlasting gloom if she ascends and, though to do Olive justice she didn't, utter damnation if she descends. Judging from the lady novelists, a woman's life isn't worth living. Otherwise, "Ascent" is the study of an egoist, a bit consciously, but on the whole brilliantly done.

A Twelve Years Agreement

The cooperative arrangement between San Francisco and Spring Valley under which this company is increasing your water supply to meet the pressing needs of growing population and industrial expansion represents a common ground of understanding that assures adequate development and ample water for many years to come.

The problem that confronted the city was to increase the water supply without delay, but it was necessary to provide a working program that this company could carry out. Appeal was made to the Railroad Commission.

The Commission proposed a practical and workable solution for the future water supply, based on the cooperation of city and company.

The decision provided for an agreement between city and company whereby the company would carry construction of Calaveras Dam to a height sufficient to yield 24 millions gallons of water daily, and the city would immediately construct the westerly division of its Hetch Hetchy conduit to convey this Calaveras water to Crystal Springs Lake. The company to pay for the use of the conduit.

Before approving this program the city added two important conditions.

First, that the company construct a conduit to carry Calaveras water from its source to the Hetch Hetchy line at Irvington; and Second, that the company pay the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds during construction of the city's conduit, thus freeing the taxpayers entirely from this burden.

Though the Railroad Commission had not seen fit to impose these conditions, the company accepted them, realizing that the water supply of the city was at stake.

At the same time the life of the agreement between city and company was extended from 10 to 12 years.

For twelve years, therefore, San Francisco and Spring Valley will be a virtual partnership in meeting the increasing water needs of our community.

In selecting crudes for Zerolene the Standard Oil Company has the advantage of its own large production of practically every type of crude. The company is not compelled to use any particular crude because it happens to be the only one available.

Crudes selected for Zerolene are brought to our refineries in special pipe lines. They are refined by our own patented, high-vacuum process which preserves their "oiliness" and stability.

No other refiner on the Pacific Coast uses any form of vacuum distillation. No other refiner in the United States uses as high a vacuum as this company

Purity Essential

Zerolene oils are pure. This company has always considered the removal of all detrimental properties and compounds as essential in making Zerolene.

Because of their "oiliness," stability and purity, Zerolene oils give perfect lubrication, and permit the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

"THE FIRST FIFTY YEARS."

At the Players Theatre is being given this week this quite remarkable play, which is the first dramatic work of Henry Myers, an untied young playwright, and which won in the East an unqualified success.

There are only two rôles in this drama of matrimony, those of the husband and of the wife. The author's feat was to recognize the dramatic possibilities in marriage, played thus by the two contracting parties, without any contributing characters whatever; and further to depict in quite a masterly manner the effect of the slow processes of time on two people whose bond was forged, in the beginning, in the heat of what ought to have been merely a passing youthful attraction. It works as life has shown us it sometimes will, only there is a quality of deadly malice that develops in those two averse, divided hearts that prevents the couple from being wholly typical even of marital partners whose affections slowly change to aversion.

Alas, for poor human nature, which so loves novelty that long comradeship and mutual parenthood can not always keep husband and wife together when the other partner's habits, disposition, moods and moles, ways and looks and angles become so bore-somely familiar that repugnance is finally generated; a fierce and dividing force.

In "The First Fifty Years" the woman, after her disillusionment, takes to dreams; for women are incurably romantic; and she reverts tenderly to memories of the rejected suitor, forgetting that if she had married him she would see him daily in the same dull light of prose as she saw her husband. It never occurred to her that he, also, would throw his shoes on the floor, and complain of the size of the bills, and voraciously demand a champagne dinner on a larger beer income; that he also might have a pinchbeck heart and the disposition of a rattlesnake, and even come home to dinner smelling of the barber shop.

Nor did it occur to her that he might find that she had a tendency to complain of trivial things, and was of a pugnacious, even combative disposition.

Mutually faulty were the young pair; that's where Henry Myers showed a stroke of new genius. We couldn't take sides, but looked on, breathlessly interested spectators at the development of this strange, amusing, heart-breaking drama of sundered hearts.

At first, when the young bridal pair came to their tiny, simple home, their happiness and mutual infatuation had that touching quality attached to all things beautiful and ephemeral; a baby's shell-like fairness, a young girl's innocence, the tender bloom of early spring. We looked at them with fatu-ous grins of tender sympathy. We had once been there.

A year passed; and though they still loved each other they had begun to bump against each other's individual idiosyncrasies, as the limited imagination of the wife could never conceive that, if she had wedded the other, they also might do.

And so the play goes on, showing sadly the disintegrating processes of time on two people who are very faulty, and commonplace in every respect except for a capacity for holding out in a quarrel. It is scarcely normal for people to maintain spite and resentment for so long a time; and yet it is both possible and probable that Henry Myers derived his idea from some item in the paper that told of just such a ten-year feud.

One wonders if the young playwright pioneering in this field belongs to the disillusioned young radicals of the present day, and if his play is an expression of twentieth-century disillusionment. I scarcely think so; for he holds us throughout the play; which can not be said of many of the young writers of the present; Floyd Dell, for instance, who won a best-seller with his "Moon-Calf," and who yet was tedious in a many of its earlier chapters; probably because he looked too much inward and too little outward.

The author of "The First Fifty Years," in spite of the blow the play inflicts on romanticism and impractical idealism, handles the first scene very prettily. He gives us plenty of food for amusement in phases, for the play is a peculiar blend of tragedy and comedy, in which it shows its similarity to life; that, indeed, is why it holds us.

Evelyn Vaughan and William S. Rainey shine in their handling of their respective rôles, the former popular leading lady of the Alcazar showing considerable dramatic power in her delivery of the wife's thunder and lightning mood, and restrained yet deeply expressive emotion during the long and sullen ground swell that followed the storm.

Miss Vaughan dressed the part very interestingly, her gowns showing gradual changes in the fashions, although she eschewed the unpicturesque exaggerations of the 'eighties—or somewhere in the later decades of the nineteenth century—when sleeves were like balloons ready for flight.

She was very charmingly and exquisitely gowned and latched as the bride, but some defect in the lighting did not permit us to see how much so until she came to the very front of the stage.

I think Miss Vaughan would have done better to wear medium brown hair rather than baby flaxen, which is rather trying, in spite of an immutable feminine conviction that it is transforming and beautifying. I remember that Blanche Bates had a similar conviction, as shown by her wearing a flaxen wig in "Molière." As a result of the flaxen curls Miss Vaughan grew steadily better looking as the play advanced until she was obliged to represent gray hairs and wrinkles; and even at the twenty-fifth anniversary—the play, after the first scene, represents the various popularly celebrated anniversaries—she was a very handsome fifty-year-old.

Mr. Rainey also entered with great thoroughness into his rôle, although the purely professional experience of his associate counted in her favor. But the young actor carried us with him in the part, and his make-ups for the various ages of the husband as the years advanced were most convincing.

Mr. Rainey's comedy was discreet and restrained, his youthful infatuation in the first act naturally and amusingly expressed, although his gestures were not sufficiently free, and both the players easily carried our illusion with them as they represented the gradual toll laid upon them in character and disposition by the advancing years.

It is a strange, absorbing life drama, this play, which reaches a passionate crescendo that affects us painfully. And then comes the silent act; a tragedy of glacial estrangement which chills the heart. It was not written for a lesson or a moral, but perhaps it may convey some kind of warning to the young and heedless who rush into matrimony with mates whose natures are a sealed book to them with the same gleeful impetus with which they go on a pleasure jaunt. For wily nature lays her traps, and into them we must walk, willy nilly.

The little theatre was well filled by an attentive audience which took occasion, at the end of the first scene, to give a cordial welcome to the two favorites, and load the lady with welcoming blooms.

It was largely a youthful audience; yet the play is one that will deeply interest all ages; the young who expect to venture into the deeps and shallows of matrimony; the mature, who perhaps are still swimming in deep water; the old, who perhaps have reached a place where the footing is firm; and the very old, who, in sight of eternity, can look back with philosophic calm on those far-off emotions that time has so dulled.

It was a happy idea to provide the suggestive musical background of old love songs during the entr'actes; old songs which were in harmony with the old-time garments worn: the woman's saques, flounces, and trains, and the man's full-blown trousers, Congress gaiters, and waistcoat gathered in at the back; although, true enough, a singer more in pitch would have made it a happier one. The setting, too, taken from Livingston Platt's designs, was in accord with the times, little modifications creeping in, in hanging and upholstery, as advancing years brought the long-deferred prosperity, and the wife, true woman that she was, clad herself in silk, and her furniture and windows in velvet.

NATIVE DRAMA.

There was a time when the American stage largely depended on Europe for plays. That was in the transition period of the Victorian epoch, when the Oscar Wilde, Arthur Pinero, Henry Arthur Jones and R. C. Carton plays traveled to New York as soon as they made a London success, while for humor the American stage depended on French farces, which were produced on this side ad nauseam, until the public finally revolted.

Then ensued a long period of native drama, during which Bronson Howard, James Herne, Clyde Fitch, Augustus Thomas, William Gillette and plenty of others delighted the American public by giving it the then novel sensation of seeing itself on the stage where it had been witnessing the entertaining but not so absorbing goings-on of British noblemen and French Bohemians.

And now there seems to be a heavy European wave setting toward the reef erected by native drama, and threatening to engulf it. There are murmurs from some devoted adherents to the native drama, and complaints of the foreign tinge to the Eastern stage. And it is true that these plays by Europeans temporarily displace American plays, but the murmurers must recollect that a new order of things has come about with the passing of the war.

An immense curiosity about the life, the literature, the ways of thought, the art of other countries has developed; America being more the object of it than almost any other nation.

And while we are welcoming the plays of Shaw, of Andrejev, of Guitry, of Bataille, of Milne, to our shores, let us not forget that American plays, or theatrical entertainment, have been much in demand in both London and Paris, where they are always to be seen under the aura of success. So much so, in fact, that tourists in London have found that if they go to the play as guests, without having previously heard what it is to be, they are apt to stumble against something they have previously seen in New York.

Berlin is crammed with Russians, who figure prominently in its artistic life, Paris with Americans, London with divers nationalities. The half of the world is getting acquainted with the other half.

America is doing its share, and perhaps we are all learning something from this general perusal of the minds and hearts of other nationalities.

In the meantime the full production of American plays is, temporarily, in partial eclipse. Or so we judge from figures published by Augustin Duncan, director general of the Equity Players, who judges, from the plans for the forthcoming season of the big New York producers, that "the native drama would appear to be in a parlous state."

Mr. Duncan outlines the plans of the Equity Players' thirty weeks' season in New York, during which they intend to give five plays, two American, one British, one Continental, and one a daring modern experiment, nationality as yet untold.

The significant point is that, while the European plays are easily obtainable, the Equity Players, unable to compete with the big producers, are experiencing considerable difficulty in finding the two American plays desired in the mass of dramas being looked over by their play-readers.

Here in San Francisco we will shortly have an opportunity to see Molnar's "Lilliom," which, having had a most successful run in New York, is to be acted at the to-be-Blaze—now the Savoy—by the company which is to make up the San Francisco Stage Guild—this title having displaced the first one chosen.

"Lilliom" attracted wide attention in New York, Eva Le Gallienne's and Joseph Schildkraut's impersonations of the two leading characters having, not alone satisfied, but charmed the spectators. It now remains for us to see how well American players will convey the general atmosphere of the play in this most interesting experiment.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Just Suppose," which was so successfully produced at Henry Miller's Theatre, New York, last year, is to be offered at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks commencing Monday night, August 14th. The comedy is from the able pen of A. E. Thomas, who has given the stage some of its most delightful works of the past few years. "Come Out of the Kitchen," "The Rainbow," and "Her Friend the King" are a trio of his well-known comedies.

"Just Suppose" is believed to have had its inspiration in the recent visit to this country of the young Prince of Wales.

A young chap incognito visits a Southern home and there falls in love with the young miss of the house, the rôle played by Isabelle Lowe. How the romance is blasted by the call of royal blood makes for an attractive three-act comedy. Opposite Miss Lowe as co-star will appear Creighton Hale in the other principal rôle. It fits the star to a nicety, and in fact A. E. Thomas is said to have had him in mind when he wrote the play. Mrs. Thomas Whiffen has been specially engaged to play the rôle created by her in the original production at Henry Miller's Theatre, New York.

The Orpheum Next Week.

For his final week here Gus Edwards is going to put on another revue. There will be new costumes, new numbers, and some more surprises.

Kerekjarto, genius of the violin, will play a return engagement of one week.

Laurel Lee, the "Chummy Chatterer," has personality and ability.

Heras and Wells, backyard entertainers, offer a novelty.

Roscoe Ails is a newcomer to the West. He has a large company, which includes clever Kate Pullman.

Princess Wah-Letka appears to be able to read your mind and foresee events.

Tom Smith is a promising humorist on next week's bill.

Joe Rolley is said to be the funniest black-face comedian that has been here for a long time.

day a feeling on the part of the guest of having been considered, and well thought of no matter what the disillusionment caused by the appearance of the bill a few days later. But in London they have it beaten the proverbial country mile. They charge for the reflection of a looking-glass, which is about the thinnest commodity one can imagine, and not even to be relied upon as a thing of beauty, because it is in all cases faithful. It fails to convey the compliment of an inquiry after one's health. Four American women, who had been sitting in a picture show and were going to supper afterward, stopped before a small mirror in the ladies' rest room, and observing that their noses had become a bit shiny they searched out, from that part of their attire wherein it is commonly carried, each a small powder-puff and proceeded to retouch the picture where it would do the most good. They used their own powder, their own puffs, their own time, and certainly supplied the noses that were reflected. They took nothing tangible from the mirror. But as they turned to leave an attendant said: "Tuppence each, please." "For what?" asked the Americans. "For using the mirror, madame." And one of them so far forgot herself as to turn to her neighbor and demand helplessly and tritely: "What do you know about that?" The attendant insisted, which is what she was there for, and offered to give a receipt to prove that the charge was "legitimate" and would not stop with her, but would find its way into the coffers of the cinema house. It is said that another rest room in another theatre keeps its mirrors curtained and imposes a charge of tuppence for drawing the curtain. It seems worse than the beggars' strike. Try to imagine that at the Granada, the Golden Gate, the California, or the Warfield. Anywhere you go from here it is worse.

Paris dancing masters say that one of next year's favorites will be a sort of Spanish waltz called the "Pasetto." We have seen no descriptions or specifications or directions for using, but some good things in the dance line come out of Spain. That country is the California of Europe. Another dance on the way is one known as the "Onduladad," which is enticing, for it has a wavy look and sound, and suggests possibilities of emotional motion. A jazz band armed with slurring sliphorns ought to make a good stimulant for the undulating "Onduladad." Yet, some ways you look at it, it seems to suggest something zoological—perhaps a snake. And the last syllable is associated with a popular brand of local cigar. Yes, the "Onduladad" would appear to have possibilities. Then we are to have the "Boston Reverse," which is described as the classic Boston, with reverse English on it, which will make it hard to tell where it is going. But the whole prophetic programme grows intricate to hopelessness by the addition of the "Girondella," described as a mixture of the tango and the old hesitation waltz, geared to a slight spinning movement, like a motor-car skidding on a wet pavement. After which giddiness it steadies and comforts one to hear of Isadora Duncan's latest, for which she seeks to rent the Trocadero at Paris to astound the Parisians. She calls it the "Danse Immobille," but it is to be officially known as the "Eyebrow Dance" because, according to her statement, nothing moves in it except the eyebrows. She just stands there and wiggles 'em. As she hails from Russia now, and has acquired a young Russian husband, the French authorities fear that her eyebrows may give some sort of Bolshevik signals, but if so they are keen to learn them, and they are going to let her do it. The "Eyebrow Dance" is about the lightest form of labor one could imagine. It takes almost all the work off the legs, hips, abdomen, shoulders and bosom. If Isadora can make a good thing of it there is no reason why an industry should not be started in teaching people to wiggle their ears.

The world of fashion is a strange world, the dictates of fashion are strange dictates, the changes of fashion are arbitrary and often have no basis in reason, no cause that is rational, with perhaps one exception: that sometimes change is good in itself. A person that has suffered awhile from an ulcerated tooth would gladly exchange it for a boil, and the owner of the boil would not feel cheated at all if the exchange could be effected. Probably each would pay a bonus, regarding the change itself as a benefit and worth anything it cost. Long skirts are going to be a pest and a discredit to human intelligence, but they seem to be on the way. They will be insanitary. They will be worse than that: they will be nasty. They will be awkward in appearance and it will be impossible for the most skillful modistes to make them graceful. We shall lose the beauty of female legs, unless we go to the theatre, where they are a bore. The silk stocking manufacturers will suffer financially, which is not a matter of grave public concern, and the silk dress-goods makers will gain a little, but not enough to justify the change. A rational person, one that tried to guide his life by the light of reason alone, would hardly see an adequate motive for the change. Yet it will be made, for the sake of change itself. People get tired of the old things. And the experiments may be as useful as those of nature when she tries out new forms and kills off some of the old ones that can not compete in the struggle for existence. Yet it does seem as if we had got into a flippity-floppy frame of mind that called for change every fifteen or twenty minutes, in matters that might reasonably call for change every fifteen or twenty years. The tendency asserts itself in a manner grievous to the judicious, in the field of domesticity. Some persons like to change wives or husbands as if they were changing cars. The daily papers serve us once a week or oftener with the portraits of ladies who are trying their fourth or fifth husband, and who are willing to mate again in the spring, summer, fall or winter with equal facility. This matrimonial chance-medley may have fair results ultimately in bringing together after many years and several attempts two persons who can remain interested in each other for quite awhile, but somehow the old-fashioned way of getting married for life still has a good deal to recommend it. At least, the children know who their parents are going to be for months at a time, and that has its advantages.

Such reflections are suggested by the change in the style of Japanese suicide; a gloomy subject, but significant. Time was when an offended Japanese gentleman vindicated his honor and punished his adversary by committing hari kari. That was as beautiful in its unreason as anything in Western chivalry. He left his enemy as a heritage the obligation to follow suit, which in most cases must have seemed wholly unnecessary, inasmuch as one party to the controversy had removed the controversy by removing himself. Yet it was an old custom, and suited to Japanese ideas. It is going out of fashion under the impacts of Western modes. Another beautiful suicide custom in Japan was death by drowning, not in some wintry "waste of seas," but in a beautiful reach of a rocky stream, so that the affair would look as much as possible like a Japanese print. That, too, is passing. And what is the substitute? Rat poison; what is known in Japan as neko irasu: literally, "cat-not-needed medicine." It will do the work—but it does seem a little too rational, and the change too much like the change from Japanese costume to the Occidental rig of tail coat and black trousers, and "vest": a dress which does not suit the Japanese, and is uglier than the deuce on Americans and Englishmen and Frenchmen. How colorful our streets might be if we could only get away from it! What shoals of shifting, changing, weaving light and beauty we might have if we just had the nerve to dress in colored silks or velvets, with laced-up doublets and slashed sleeves and long hose, and shoes or boots that had some other lines than those of our present little leather boxes for the feet! Who will start it?

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A woman of the most unmistakably conservative type had accidentally got into the railway coach reserved for smokers. With ill-concealed indignation she saw the man next her fill his pipe. "Sir," she said frigidly, "smoking always makes me ill." "Does it, ma'am," was the polite rejoinder. "Take my advice and give it up."

Two Irishmen, at desperation point, held up a passing Scotchman. They should have known better. After a long stiff fight in which the Scot very nearly had the best of them they succeeded in getting him down. A close search revealed a tupenny piece. "Troth, Mike," said Pat, disgustedly, "if he'd had sixpence he'd have murdered the two of us."

A young woman in Washington, recently returned from abroad, was describing her experiences in mountain-climbing to a friend in the diplomatic service. "Ah, mees," said the foreign diplomat, "so you climb zat mountain? Zat was a foot to be proud of!" "Pardon me, count," said the American girl, "feat." "O-ohh!" exclaimed the count, "so you climb him more than once?"

An apartment house on Riverside Drive which goes in for heavy English service recently blossomed out with a new flunkey. A gentleman calling for Mrs. Brown was detained with the customary, "Is Mrs. Brown expecting you?" The caller blasted the new doorman with a glance. "My good man," was the unexpected answer, "Mrs. Brown was expecting me before I was born. She's my mother."

A farm hand rented a field from his boss with the stipulation that the rent was to be one-fourth of the crop raised. At harvest time the farmer was amazed to find that he received nothing at all in exchange for the field. The farm hand hauled three loads of produce to his own barn, so the farmer remonstrated. "How's this? Wasn't I to get a fourth of the crop?" he demanded in righteous indignation. "Yes, you was," candidly rejoined the tenant, "but as it turned out there was only three-fourths."

A waitress in a Far Western railway restaurant watched an Eastern traveler with solicitude for awhile, evidently worried about him, but as evidently timid about approaching him. Finally her anxiety got the better of her reserve and she asked him sympathetically: "What's the matter? Aint yer got no knife?" "Oh, yes," said the traveler, exhibiting his weapon. She heaved a sigh of relief. "That's all right, then," she said. "I seen yer puttin' yer fork in yer mouth an' I didn't know what was the matter. I been afraid ye'd stick yerself."

Senator Watson of Georgia is famous for his darky stories. One of his favorites is of the old colored mammy who was dusting a bronze bust of Shakespeare. "Marse Henry, who am dis yere gemman?" she asked one day. "That's Shakespeare, Aunt Sarah," said Marse Henry. "Shakespeare, the immortal poet." "Am dat him?" the old colored woman was plainly enthusiastic. "I'se done hea a lot 'bout dat Shakespeare. 'Deed, Marse Henry, I'se done hea so much 'bout him I allus thought he was a white gemman."

The foreign press is saturated with references to Emile Coué and his wonderful system, but so far our native papers have not been very badly bitten. A characteristic Coué story from the London Morning Post is as follows: A certain man suffered acutely from bow legs. He was advised by a friend to repeat the Coué formula every night thirty times: "Every day and in every way my legs are getting straighter and straighter." Unfortunately he miscalculated the number and repeated the magic words sixty times every night. As a result he is now knock-kneed.

Ebenezer Washington was up before the judge for his third drunk. The judge, wishing to be lenient to an old man, said: "I'll let you off easy this time, Ebenezer, but the next time you appear before me on a charge of drunkenness you'll go up the river." The old negro thanked him and staggered out of the courtroom. Next morning Ebenezer was up again on the familiar charge. "Ebenezer," said the judge, "you must remember what I said to you yesterday. Have you anything to say for yourself?" "Nuffin, jedge," the old negro blinked up at him, "'cept dat dis am de same drunk."

Clare Sheridan, the English sculptor, was reminiscing about Queen Victoria and her characteristic taste at a luncheon in New York. Speculating on how the queen would react to modern society and its ways, she said: "The queen, you know, doubted if heaven itself would be quite up to her standard. Once at Windsor they were talking about the pleasure the various great monarchs and rulers of history would have when they met in heaven. The queen considered the matter in silence for some time. Then she said firmly: 'As for me, I shall never consent to meet David—on account of his scandalous treatment of Uriah, you know.'

Associate Justice William R. Day is said to have the story-telling habit and to practice it even in the solemn precincts of the Supreme Court. One of his favorites is that of the lawyer who kept interrupting his witness' answer to a certain question. The question from the prosecuting attorney was, "Where were you between 10 and 10:30 on the morning of the 9th of August?" "I object," protested the lawyer for the defense. "Let him ask me," the witness protested excitedly. The relevancy of the question was argued for awhile and finally dropped, but not by the prosecuting attorney. He soon got back to the debated question and the defense again objected. And again the witness wildly cried, "Let him ask me! Let him ask me!" The third time the 10 to 10:30 question appeared with the same results the court stepped into the breach and ruled that the question was material. "Where were you between 10 and 10:30 on the morning of the 9th of August?" asked the prosecutor. "I don't remember," lisped the witness.

First Crook—I've bin wonderin', Bill—how does a man get his own money out of a bank? Second Crook—Easy. He jes' forges his own name to de check.—Life.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Remarkable Rightness of Dad.
When I was young and stocks were high,—
And money grew on every tree,
I often said to myself, said I,
"A broker's life is the life for me!
They always seem to have such fun!
I wonder how the trick is done."
But Father had another plan.
"My son," he said, "the Law will do."
And since he was a forceful man,
I coldly answered, "Done with you."
But oh the pain it was to me
That I could not a broker be.
They used to take me out to dine,
Those happy, snappy broker-sports
And when they'd had a little wine
They reveled in committing torts:
Those were the days when nothing lacked
Except, of course, the Volstead Act.
But now Time's mighty pendulum
Has swung to quite another side:
The great financial sea is dumb
Where once the brokers used to ride.
I con my cases in the night
And murmur softly, "Dad was right."

The Swadeshi Movement in India.

The second phase of the swadeshi movement, the boycotting and burning of English goods, stirred up an immense amount of bitter feeling in India, writes Gertrude Emerson in Asia Magazine for August. From this source, more smoke was written across the skies of Bombay than any other place, perhaps because the Bombay mill-owners soon discovered that the bonfires and the boycott materially helped the home industry. Wherever possible, after the Congress and Khalifat committees had organized the collection of a huge pile of cloth to be burned as a demonstration, Gandhi was invited to touch the pile off.

From the practical point of view, one may cite a few figures to show the adverse effects upon the English cotton market of the Indian boycott, combined with other circumstances attendant upon the general situation. The normal annual import of manufactured cotton may be put down at something over £50,000,000 sterling. Before the war, India was the largest consumer of Lancashire cotton products, buying 45 per cent. of the total production. This percentage dropped to 22 in 1919, but rose again to 31 in 1920. Now comes the report that shipments of cotton cloth from Great Britain in 1921 are the smallest in a period of over fifty years. But it is unfair to attribute the fall, or even the largest, measure of this marked falling off of imports to the Gandhi movement, because the great rise in prices since the war, together with increased taxation to meet the deficit of nineteen crores in the national budget last year, must reflect itself in the purchasing power of the people.

"This movie ought to be good." "Why so?" asked the saturnine citizen. "Harold Heartbreak, the peerless screen lover, leaps from a precipice two thousand feet high." "Does he break his neck?" "Of course not. It's just a camera trick." "Then that particular movie is not worth a quarter to me."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

The MOTOR OIL FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cyclo as shown on the Cyclo Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Mr. and Mrs. John A. Buck announce the engagement of their youngest daughter, Miss Viola Buck, to Mr. Harry Earle Wright. The news was first told at a luncheon party given at the Buck home on Gough Street the middle of the week. Miss Buck was graduated from Miss Hamlin's school and attended an Eastern school near Washington. She is the sister of Mr. Walter E. Buck, Mr. John A. Buck, Jr., and of Mrs. Charles Hufschmidt. The wedding will be an event of the early winter. Mr. Wright, before coming to San Francisco, made his home in St. Johns, Canada. He is connected in business with one of the banking concerns here.

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Georgia Creed to Mr. Addison Posey has been made, with August 22d chosen as the date for the wedding. Miss Creed is the daughter of Mrs. William Creed of Linda Vista and sister of Mr. Wiggington Creed. The ceremony will be a simple one, witnessed only by the immediate members of the family. There will be no attendants to the bride. Mr. Wiggington Creed will give his sister away. After their wedding tour Mr. and Mrs. Posey will return to make Piedmont their home.

News of the engagement of Miss Doris Wirtner, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John J. Wirtner, to Mr. Francis Howard McCandless, has come as a surprise. The wedding date has been set for early November. Miss Wirtner is the sister of Mrs. Hubert Haven Anderson and Miss Harriet Wirtner. Engagement cards have been withheld because of the recent death of Mrs. Herbert Jensen at Shanghai. Mr. McCandless is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Francis McCandless of Seattle and a nephew of Mr. James McCandless.

Miss Katherine Bentley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Irving Bentley, entertained in honor of Miss Hope Somerset at the San Francisco Golf and Country Club at luncheon. Miss Hope Somerset is to become the bride of Mr. Donald Walsh on August 30th. Miss Bentley's guests at the luncheon were Mrs. Harry Hush Magee, Mrs. Lindsay Miller, Miss Katherine Maxwell, Miss Kittie Fletcher, Miss Elizabeth Moore, Miss Claire Knight, Miss Elva Ghirardelli, Miss Katherine Armstrong, and Miss Dorothy Grissim.

Major and Mrs. Philip Wales entertained at dinner at their Menlo home on Thursday evening. Their guests were Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mr. and Mrs. James Howell and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Poole.

On the following day Mrs. James Howell, Mrs. Wales' daughter, entertained Mrs. Charles McCormick, Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mrs. Augustus Taylor, Mrs. Roy Bishop, Mrs. Frank Hooper, Mrs. Arthur Hooper, Mrs. Clinton La Montagne, Mrs. Stanley Murphy, Mrs. Henry Poole and Mrs. Frank B. King at luncheon at the Menlo Park Country Club.

In honor of Count and Countess André de Limur of Paris and of Mrs. Malcolm Whitman of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker entertained twelve guests at dinner Friday evening at their San Mateo home.

Miss Gladys Quarre entertained at an informal luncheon on Thursday. Her guests were Mrs. Paul I. Fagan, Mrs. Stanwood Murphy, Mrs. Francis Langton, Mrs. Albert Rees and Miss Frances Lent. Miss Quarre, with her mother, Mrs. Charles Quarre, is occupying Mrs. Harry Hill's house during Mrs. Hill's absence abroad.

A first-night audience of San Francisco society was present Monday evening at the cozy Players Theatre on Bush Street to welcome home Evelyn Vaughan and William S. Rainey in their amusing play of married life, "The First Fifty Years." Miss Vaughan has many friends here, and a number of Bohemian Club members were present to greet Mr. Rainey. Among those who entertained guests were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Josselyn, Mr. Joseph D. Redding, Mr. Templeton Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. Haig Patigian, Mr. Charles G. Norris, Kathleen Norris, Dr. Frank Rodolph, Mr. Guernsey Newlin, Miss Adella Dugan, Mr. Herbert Dugan, Mr. F. A. Denicke, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crane, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Scott, Jr., Mr. Charles K. Field, Mr. Richard M. Hotaling, Mrs. Margaret C. May, Mr. T. Daniel Frawley, Miss Adèle Blood, Miss Emelie Melville, Mr. Nino Marcelli, Mr. Charles Caldwell Dobie.

Mrs. C. A. Severance, wife of the president of the American Bar Association, was honored at a luncheon given by Mrs. W. H. H. Piatt of Kansas City in the Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis Monday. The guests were Mrs. John W. Davis, Mrs. Fred W. Wadham, Mrs. Charles Henry Butler, Mrs. Bruce Sanborn, Mrs. Clarence Goodman, Mrs. Hugh Brown, Mrs. William Denman, Mrs. Vaughan Thompson, Mrs. Mark Potter, Mrs. Charles Thaddeus Terry, Mrs. Jeff Chandler, Mrs. William Nathan McChesney, Mrs. John Lowell, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Miss Grace Smith.

The Garden and the Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis have been the scene of several enjoyable luncheon parties during the week. Mrs. Sydney Cloman and Mrs. Algernon Gibson were members of a small group last Monday. Miss Anne Peters entertained Mrs. Ord Preston of Washington, D. C., and her two attractive daughters, the Misses Mary and Eleanor Preston, at luncheon in the Fable Room. Mrs. R. P. Schwerin and Mrs. Lawrence McCreery took luncheon together. Mrs. George T. Cameron and Miss Helen Garrett were part of another group.

A luncheon party in the Garden of the St.

Francis included Miss Jennie Blair, Miss Celia O'Connor, and Mrs. Ritchie L. Dunn. Mrs. Murray Potter was hostess to a party of four in the Fable Room. Others entertaining at luncheon were Mrs. D. C. Murphy, Mrs. Louis Titus, Mrs. Elmer Cox, Mrs. A. Peters, Mrs. Benjamin Schlesinger, Mrs. Elsie Levey, Mrs. Rose Goldwater.

At the Hotel Rafael.

The Hotel Rafael is becoming a favorite base of operations and point of departure for parties motoring to Muir Woods, Mt. Tamalpais, and other places of interest. Among those who enjoyed these outings over the week-end were Mr. and Mrs. M. Winegartner, Mr. and Mrs. D. Zelinsky, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Zelinsky, Dr. and Mrs. S. W. Thorne and Miss Sue Thorne.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dakin of Pasadena, who are spending several weeks at the Hotel Rafael, were hosts at a dinner party on Saturday night.

Others who entertained at the dinner-party on Saturday night were Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Speight, Mr. and Mrs. R. Wahlen, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Waldo Ivanovich, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Varney and Mrs. B. Lincoln.

A motor party from Los Angeles who spent the week-end at the Hotel Rafael were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Callendar, Mr. Harry Callendar and Miss Virginia Callendar.

Colonel and Mrs. George E. Gillis and family from the Presidio are guests at the Hotel Rafael during the summer vacation of Colonel Gillis.

How Mark Twain Wrote His Books.

Describing his method of writing in a new chapter from his "Autobiography" in the August Harper's Magazine, Mark Twain says:

"There has never been a time in the past thirty-five years when my literary shipyard hadn't two or more half-finished ships on the ways, neglected and baking in the sun; generally there have been three or four. This has an unbusinesslike look, but it was not purposeless, it was intentional. As long as a book would write itself, I was a faithful and interested amanuensis, and my industry did not flag; but the minute that the book tried to shift to my head the labor of contriving its situations, inventing its adventures, and conducting its conversations. I put it away and dropped it out of my mind. Then I examined my unfinished properties to see if among them there might not be one whose interest in itself had revived, through a couple of years' restful idleness, and was ready to take me on again as amanuensis.

"It was by accident that I found out that a book is pretty sure to get tired along about the middle, and refuse to go on with its work until its powers and its interests should have been refreshed by a rest and its depleted stock of raw materials reinforced by lapse of time. It was when I had reached the middle of 'Tom Sawyer' that I made this invaluable find. At page 400 of my manuscript the story made a sudden and determined halt and refused to proceed another step. Day after day it still refused. I was disappointed, distressed, and immeasurably astonished, for I knew quite well that the tale was not finished, and I could not understand why I was not able to go on with it. The reason was very simple—my tank had run dry; it was empty; the stock of materials in it was exhausted; the story could not go on without material; it could not be wrought out of nothing. When the manuscript had lain in a pigeon-hole two years I took it out one day, and read the last chapter that I had written. It was then that I made the great discovery that when the tank runs dry you've only to leave it alone and it will fill up again, in time, while you are asleep—also while you are at work at other things, and are quite unaware that this unconscious and profitable cerebration is going on. There was plenty of material now, and the book went on and finished itself without any trouble."

The Science of the Sea.

In the death in June of Prince Albert of Monaco science loses a generous patron and a distinguished student. Oceanography, or the science of the sea, is not a poor man's study, but the prince never hesitated to expend his great wealth in its furtherance, says the Manchester Guardian. He fitted out in the most up-to-date manner several research ships, which added greatly to the knowledge of the seas round the Mediterranean, the Azores, the North Atlantic, and later in the Polar regions, increasing at the same time meteorological knowledge. In the great museum at Monaco, which he built, are housed unrivaled collections of specimens and apparatus, besides the ample accommodation made for research work. For the better teaching of the subject he built at his own expense the Oceanographical Institute of Paris, endowing it with £160,000, and placing it under an international committee of oceanographers. He added many new species to Atlantic fauna, and his own researches are recorded in a series of monumental publications. Another side of his character was seen in his keen support for the suppression of pigeon-shooting in his own principality, for, as he said at the time, "the more one studies animal life the more one is convinced that the denial of rights to animals involves the denial of rights to men."

CURRENT VERSE.

Old Mr. So-and-So.

When I first came here, a dozen years ago,
The mountains said they'd tell me when time came to go.

That is a promise they've never taken back;
Today they pointed Gabriel the way to my shack.
Early this morning when the first cock crew,
God's angel touched me and named a rendezvous.

I've a little water and I've a little meal;
I'll build me a fire while I can still feel.

Beneath a down coverlid my father died,
With smooth linen sheets tucked along the side,
With a priest and a nurse and a screen from the fair,
And a second silken screen to break the lamp's glare.

That is what it meant to me, when people said:
"Old Mr. So-and-So died in his bed."

There's no one to care and there's no one to come.

I'll build me a fire before my hands are numb.

The first birds are here and the flowers will come soon,

A warm wet wind blows clouds across the moon.
Old men are cold, and it is a bitter thing
To live through the winter and die in the spring.

Again it will be true and again it will be said:
"Old Mr. So-and-So died in his bed."

No screens to break the searching rays that pour
On bare plank and hearth, with Gabriel at the door!

—Malleville Haller in the Nation.

"The God at Whom I Grumble."

(These striking verses are taken by Littell's Living Age from the Scottish Farm Servant, a monthly magazine which is the organ of the Agricultural Laborers' Union of Scotland.)

O Lord, I cannae understand
The things that Ye pit aff yer hand:

The earth and sea are greatly planned,
I must admit;

The heavens, glorious and grand,
Prove your fine wit.

And when we see—we're no sae stuipet—
The comet's on a leash and grippet,

And led like oay collier's whippet
Upon the road;

We ken Ye're nae wisne mean or nippet—
You are a God!

Bit why should the Great Engineer,
That set thae worlds a' in gear,

And sent them spinnin' year by year
Wi' sic precision,

Delight to treat puir mortals here
Wi' cauld derision?

It's said Ye watch the sparrow's fa'
And keep a reek'nin' o' them a',

And still Ye send the drivin' snaw,
And mak' it freeze,

Till hundreds o' them dwine awa'
By slow degrees!

I aften think the bonny floo'ers
Are sweet thoughts o' your musing 'oors,

Bit oh, the fancy short endures
Tae see Ye clatch

Them up in wrathfu' sleety shoo'ers—
A foul debauch!

A mither's heart, a bairnie fair,
Ye fashion baith wi' tender care,

And syne some day Ye smash your ware
Dang a' tae bits:

The bairn is brocht in deid—noo there!
That fairly grits!

I am na sic a hopeless duffer
But what I ken it's guid tae suffer,

Bit yet what wey sood Ye be gruffer
Wi' some bairn

Than what Ye are wi' some auld buffer
Whae needs his fairin'?

Ye see oor king set his hall mark
Upon some brewer or ither spark,

While bairnies gang wi'oot sark
To pay the fee—

I'd strike the rale clamjamfary stark,
If it was me!

To mak' a' clear I strive and stumble
Till my puir wits are in a jumble,

Syne, in my weariness grown humble,
I come to see

That the God at wham I grumble
Is far yont me.

Just as my dowg or wee jakedaw
May think me whiles an unco thrav

That wi'elds without a reasoned law
The ruling rod,

Hoo is a man fit to misca'
The weys o' God?

My dowg ne'er understands I'm shair,
When instinct's strong implanted there,

What wey he soodnae hunt a hare
Or chase a cat;

Bit still I cannae my weys square
Wi' his for that. . . .

Lord, pardon a presumptuous fule,
Whae thinks that wi' a lichter spill

He'll read the Great Inscrutable
Like A B C;

The meal maun ey gang thro' the mill,
And sae maun we.

At Del Monte.

The largest gathering of society people of the year at Del Monte will take place the latter part of this month for the annual California golf championships. The contests on the links will get under way August 25th to 27th with the holding of the Del Monte summer tournament, and on September 2d to 10th the championships are to be played off.

Everett H. Seaver, president of the California Golf Association this year, will stop at Del Monte Lodge with Mrs. Seaver. Mr. and Mrs. Kingsbury of San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Cameron, Mr. and Mrs. Cyril Tobin, Mr. M. H. de Young and Mr. and Mrs. Robert A. Roos are among others who have made reservations at the Lodge. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur H. Vincent of San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Forsman of Pasadena, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Fertig of Pasadena, Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Nares of Fresno, Colonel and Mrs. Hudson Poole of Pasadena, W. W. Crocker and Miss Helen Crocker of Burlingame, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Cravens of Pasadena, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Cook of Kansas City, Mr. and Mrs. Pliny Holt of Stockton, Mr. and Mrs. Elmer H. Cox of San Francisco, and a number of others who have their homes at Pebble Beach will entertain house guests during the golf celebration.

Some Music Is Worse Than the Rest.

Here is something in music that is a more typical, a more comprehensive expression of the modern American spirit, than all our coon songs, our pseudo-Indian wails, the regional songs of a hundred years ago, the tenth-rate imitation of vile English ballads, the imperfect echoes of French impressionism, says Carl Engel in the Atlantic Monthly. Good jazz is enjoyed by capital musicians, by men who are neither inordinately immoral nor extravagantly uncultured. It has fascinated European composers like Stravinsky, Casella, Satie, as Debussy was fascinated before them by rag-time. "Golliwog's Cakewalk" and "Minstrels" are works of the purest art, notwithstanding the fact that the essence of their peculiar charm was filtered from the emanations of the music-hall.

Maurice Ravel, last summer, told Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill, who was visiting him, that he considered jazz the only original contribution America had so far made to music. Nor do American composers of repute disdain to try their hand at it. Leo Sowerby, the young Chicagoan, who is the first musical stipendiary to be sent to the American Academy in Rome, has been guilty of sounding the jazz note in his chamber music and in a piano concerto. No less respectable a person than Professor Hill himself, associate professor of music in Harvard University, a man who may be credited with harboring no desire for cheap notoriety, has signed his name to a "Study in Jazz" which Messrs. Pattison and Maier have played in their remarkable recitals for two pianos, and which, arranged for full orchestra, I believe, has been programmed by M. Monteux for the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony. There is frank and appropriate tribute paid to jazz in Mr. John Alden Carpenter's "Krazy Kat" ballet.

What more conclusive evidence could you demand to prove that jazz—good jazz—is not void of musical possibilities, not wanting in musical merit? If the fastidious musician succumbs to it, can you blame the people of America and Europe for liking good jazz?

The Senatorial Campaign.

The issue in the senatorial campaign is in plain view. Shall California continue to be represented in the Senate by a man who holds to no party allegiance excepting as it serves his convenience, one who has opposed President Harding in his most important endeavors and who promises nothing better in future, one affiliated with William Randolph Hearst, one recently in the service of the Tammany Hall government of New York City, one whose instinct and habit or those of opposition and detraction, a man whose views and courses are inspired by his prejudices and his hatreds? Or shall it be represented by a man of vastly higher character who has entered the field as the representative of the loyal Republicanism of California, as a supporter of President Harding, a man illustrating in his own character ability, loyalty, and constructive instinct and habit of mind?

The tactical advantages of the situation are obviously with Mr. Johnson. He is the director of an organization which came into existence upon the basis of state patronage and is still largely supported from the state treasury. Presumably there is coöperation between Johnson and the present governor, who is a candidate for reelection—at least what is called the state machine is enlisted in Johnson's behalf. Again presumably he has the backing of the radical leadership of organized labor, with whom he has long coöperated in furtherance of its extreme pretensions and demands. The quasi-criminal elements, the emotionalists always easily won by rhetorical fury, the rag-tag-and-bob-tail in general—all are for "Hiram." On the other hand, the intelligent, the thoughtful, the responsible elements are behind Mr. Moore. Particularly those who would like to see California represented in the Senate by sanity and dependability, by a man not mixed up with Hearst, with Tammany Hall, or other sinister affiliations are supporting Mr. Moore.

There is evidence of widespread resentment of Senator Johnson's opposition to the Four-Power pact and of his continued policy of pin-pricking in relation to the Harding administration. Intelligent and thoughtful citizens are weary of the sound and fury that attends every public appearance of Mr. Johnson and of the malevolence that seems to inspire his course. There is a general sense that California is misrepresented by one whose name is continually associated with the chronic malcontents and obstructionists of the Senate. Both the interest and the dignity of California suffer in the fact that at a time when reason and the spirit of coöperation should rule we have in the Senate one whose affiliations and whose motives of action are questionable and whose methods are those of the chronic sensationalist and the habitual objectionist.

Mr. Moore ought to win. He has the mentality, the industry, the spirit that would make an effective senator. In the Senate he would be a true representative of California—truly representative of the wish of our people to coöperate with our worthy President in the things that make for integrity and dignity in government.

Alfred Harmsworth, Lord Northcliffe.

Prior to the year 1896, when Alfred Harmsworth began publication of the Daily Mail, British journalism was practically a class institution. It was in the main addressed to the educated and the property classes, practically ignoring the interests and the tastes of the non-cultivated multitude. Harmsworth's basic conception was a newspaper calculated by its variety, lightness, and sprightliness to attract those to whom previously the daily journal had made little or no appeal. In what measure Harmsworth drew inspiration from his observation of journalism in America is matter of speculation; but in many respects the Mail was modeled after the yellow journals of this country. It dealt less in opinion, less in solid information, and was less regardful of literary form than any general newspaper that had been offered to the British public. It emphasized the "news," and in its variety and in tone and style it was seasoned to the popular taste. From the start it was a success; and with its success began a decline in the authority and dignity of the British newspaper press. Apologists for the change introduced by Harmsworth have claimed and still maintain that in popularizing the newspaper—even to a degree vulgarizing it—Harmsworth brought about an important development in British life in that he established the habit of reading the news on the part of multitudes previously unaccustomed to follow the course of public events. It has further been claimed that he raised appreciably the level of British intelligence concerning British affairs and to an extent the affairs of the world. However this may be, the Mail quickly outgrew in circulation all the older journals, and its influence has had much to do—for good or for ill—with breaking down the monopoly in government long exercised by the property classes in Great Britain. Following the success of the Mail in the sphere of daily journalism, Harmsworth established other papers similarly addressed to wider as distinct from narrower audiences, and ultimately, through his varied and scattered publications, came to be the most influential publicist in the British realm. All this before his fortieth year.

But for all his extraordinary success in the field of popular journalism, for all his attainment of wealth and influence, Harmsworth was not satisfied. He aimed at nothing less than control of the most conservative and the most authoritative newspaper in the realm—the Times. It was an audacious ambition, seemingly out of the range of human possibility, but the fortune that had favored the young publisher in his earlier career still attended him, and in 1908 a curious conjunction of circumstances made him possessor of the "Thunderer." Then began a career which has not been matched in the records of journalism, in England or in any other country. Professionally speaking, Harmsworth led a double life. The Mail, still the large and continuing source of his wealth, ran along in its old groove as a ha'penny sensational journal, while the Times pursued its established policy as the journal of the property classes and as a counselor of government. The character of the publisher measurably rose with his responsibilities—this without entire separation from what had gone before. In becoming the editor of the Times Harmsworth took on a certain expansion of mind and policy. He became more a Times man than a Mail man. But the chasm was too wide to be spanned successfully, and both journals suffered somewhat in the effort of the proprietor to ride two horses going in diverse directions. The Mail gained something on the score of conservatism; the Times lost something of its traditional dignity and authority.

With the coming on of the war Harmsworth, by this time Viscount Northcliffe, rose from the position of a shrewd editor and publisher to that of a statesman. We shall not undertake to define or appraise his services. They may or may not have been always disinterested or separated from his personal motives. But this much may be said truthfully, that to the full extent of his powers, and under the lead of his own judgment, he threw himself into the thick of affairs with an energy that contributed largely to the course of events. His instinct for public opinion, his hardihood in meeting situations, his command of a great audience gave him a power that was hardly equaled and surely not surpassed by any other man in the period of the war. It was Northcliffe who challenged the policy of Lord Kitchener and to a degree so discredited him as to break down his prestige. It was Northcliffe and the forces under his command that drove Asquith from power and brought Lloyd George into the premiership. The agencies of publicity under the hand of Northcliffe did prodigious service in firing and sustaining the heart of England and in bringing multitudes of all ranks to war service. In the five terrible years of war Northcliffe stood at the front of forces that made for solidarity of British sentiment and for stubborn determination to fight on to the last man and the last gun. However opinions may differ as to his course in more recent events, the fact of his great service in the period of the war is title to the honors of history.

One who in the closing year of the war and in the period of the peace conference came into something approaching intimacy with Lord Northcliffe is entitled to bear testimony to the spirit and the energy with which he carried himself in the great struggle. He had in 1918 taken on an all but directing authority in the affairs of state. He was in daily, almost hourly, conference with the premier. There were no secrets of state that he did not share. There was no branch of government that did not counsel with him. He was the initiator of much and the adviser of all that bore the name of British policy. Beyond question, he was the most potent unofficial figure in the realm. To support of the war and to the military and financial policies in whose formulation he shared, he gave, not only the power of his newspapers, but his intense personal energies. Similarly he gave of his financial fortunes. His great country house of Sutton, the symbol of his material success, and next to his professional achievements the object of his pride, he sold to the Duke of Sutherland and turned the purchase price into agencies of war relief. He gave up his beautiful house in Mayfair and established himself in modest quarters near Buckingham Gate. When his wife took on hospital and other war work he gave her authority to draw to the limit of his personal resources. In every way that a commanding citizen and an earnest patriot in control of great resources could contribute to the national cause Northcliffe responded with open hands, and with complete devotion of his individual energies.

It is perhaps too much to ask of a man wholly self-made, and of one whose success was so notable, that with distinction and power he should combine personal modesty. Assuredly, Northcliffe was not a shrinking personality. He was not assertive in a vulgar sense. He was no braggart. But he loved authority, loved distinction, loved the many forms of glorification that came to him. To the many who cooperated with him he was unfailingly considerate. Himself a strict disciplinarian and a prodigious worker, he had no tolerance for the shirker or the easy-goer. One who passed several strenuous days with him bears witness to the energy with which he threw himself into the complicated activities of his position in the summer of 1918. He had a place in the country, just outside London, to which he motored late each night. It was his habit to rise at 5 o'clock, and by 7 he had read and annotated the London morning papers. Nothing in any printed column was too great or too small for his attention. By 8 o'clock he was at his office in London. Between that hour and 10 he had conferred with his leading assistants, both from the Times and the Mail, had listened to suggestions and had outlined policies for the day. From 10 to 12:30 he was in conference with the prime minister or with other members of the government. Almost daily he had in the great dining hall of the Times building a group of distinguished persons at luncheon. And so on through the day until the dinner hour, when he had usually a group of foreign guests. It was a weary man who anywhere between 10 o'clock and midnight stepped into his motor for home. All this was grilling, and in some measure at least it accounts for the collapse that seized him some three months back and which has terminated in his death at the relatively early age of fifty-seven.

Northcliffe was an intuitive thinker. His mind went straight to the end in view, whether it was the creation of a penny journal, the purchase of the Times, or the winning of the war. The more detailed and scientific processes of thought were for others; and these he knew how to bring into cooperation. In the selection of associates—and in his many enterprises he had associates by the score—he made few mistakes. His judgment of men, especially in his own professional field, was almost uncanny. He not only knew how to judge men, but how to win and to inspire them. Dominant figure that he was, he broke down no subordinate's character, damaged no man's self-respect. By no means always wise, notably inspired by love of the limelight, greedy of power and hungry for fame, Alfred Harmsworth, Lord Northcliffe, journalist and statesman, is a figure worthy of remembrance and respect.

It is an open secret that in recent years the Times has not in a commercial sense been profitable. It is further an open secret that the profits of the Mail and of Northcliffe's other enterprises have gone largely into making up the deficit of the Times. In acquiring the Times Northcliffe did not pay in bulk cash, but partly in bonds entitling him to hold the property so long as the interest was paid. The Walters family, who for generations owned the Times, may retrieve it in default of continuous payment of interest on the bonds and of their ultimate liquidation. Presumably, Northcliffe's heirs are his wife and his four brothers. Whether or not they will wish to retain the Times under the conditions essential to its maintenance is questionable. It is possible that the paper may be returned to its former ownership, and this beyond a doubt will be the wish of the conservative elements in England. Yet there is in the Walters family no man of outstanding capability, presumably no man equal to taking on the responsibilities of the paper and of bringing it up to a position where it could stand alone.

Two of Northcliffe's brothers are men of experience in the publishing business and presumably they are men of ambition. The probability is that they will wish to continue the policies of Northcliffe; and in this purpose they will almost certainly have the support of Lady Northcliffe, a woman of unusual capability and force of character, thoroughly in sympathy with her late husband's purposes.

A Moral Mistake.

Any plan of settlement of the railroad strike that calls for breach of faith on the part of the government or of the railroad executives is both morally and practically vicious. This applies directly to the proposal to adjudicate promises made by government agents and by railroad executives to men who stayed faithfully on the job and to others who came into the work under specific pledges. Nobody will question the good intentions of President Harding. But his proposal to make the assurances of the Labor Board and the promises of the railroad executives subjects of compromise is a grievous moral mistake. There can be no compromise of definite promises. Those who make pledges must either keep them in good faith or surrender both public respect and self-respect. It is easy to understand that the President has been subject to confused and misleading counsels. Obviously he has failed to comprehend the situation in all of its aspects.

Somebody, we hope, will recall that when the law establishing the Railroad Labor Board came into effect it was remarked in these columns that it did not have "teeth enough." Events are justifying that criticism. The Labor Board may prescribe rules, but its powers do not run to their enforcement, since there are practically no penalties for disobedience. Naturally the decrees of the board have been regarded as merely admonitory. Many of the railroads—very notably the Pennsylvania—have ignored the Labor Board rules in precisely the same spirit that the labor unions have ignored them. If the system of control is to become effective—if the government is to have the power to prevent strikes—it must give to the Labor Board or some other directing agency a full set of "teeth." There must be penalties, applicable both to the railroads and to the men, for disregard of the rules of the board.

The Record in the Seniority Issue.

The issue upon which the railroad strike began is now far in the background. It is no longer a matter of wages, but a question as to the conditions upon which the strikers may return to the service they abandoned July 1st. Three classes of men are affected: (a) Men who were in railroad service prior to the strike and who loyally remained at work; (b) men not recently in railroad service, but who have taken the places vacated by the strikers; (c) men who struck, abandoning the service with the incidental rights and privileges connected with it. The strikers now wish to return to the work they abandoned under conditions precisely as they stood prior to the strike. They insist that the position of each man restored to the rolls shall be precisely what it was before he left the service—in other words, they want in returning to have their "seniorities" with the rights pertaining thereto precisely as if nothing had happened.

It goes without saying that the railroad executives would gladly have many or most of their old men back on the job, but they decline to receive them under conditions of unimpaired seniority because of commitments made (a) to the men who did not go out on strike and who gained advances of seniority thereby; and (b) to men who have taken the place of the strikers, thereby establishing themselves in seniority over those whose employment may be later than their own.

The pledges given by the railroad executives, and by the Railroad Labor Board under whose authority they work, were positive and definite. On July 1st, the day when the strike was called, Chairman Hooper of the Railroad Wage Board, and representing the government, announced:

Full governmental power will protect the men who remain in their positions and new men who may come in. * * * Men who take the strikers' places are merely accepting the wages and working conditions prescribed by governmental tribunal and are performing a public service.

Three days later—on July 3d—the Railroad Labor Board passed a series of resolutions, concluding as follows:

Be it further resolved that the employees remaining in the service and the new ones entering same be accorded the application and the benefit of the outstanding wage and rule decisions of the Railroad Labor Board until they are amended and modified by agreements with said employees arrived at in conformity with the Transportation Act or by decision of this board. And be it further resolved that if it be assumed that the employees who leave the service of the carrier because of dissatisfaction over any decisions of the Labor Board are within their rights in so doing, it must likewise be conceded that the men who remain in the service and those who enter it anew are within their rights in accepting such employment; that they are not strikebreakers seeking to impose the arbitrary will of an employer upon employees, but that they have the moral as well as the legal right to engage in such service of the American public to avoid interruption of indispensable railway transportation and that they are entitled to the protection of every department and branch of the government, state and national.

Also, on July 3d, the Railroad Labor Board declared as follows:

The six organizations, comprising the Federated Shop Crafts, have notified the Railroad Labor Board that a very large majority of the employees whom they represent have left the service of the carriers; that the members of said organizations are no longer employees of the railways under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Labor Board or subject to the application of the Transportation Act.

Following these declarations by the Labor Board, President Harding, on July 11th, issued a proclamation of which one paragraph is as follows:

Whereas the maintained operation of the railways in interstate commerce and the transportation of the United States mails have necessitated the employment of men who choose to accept employment under the terms of the decision [i. e., of the United States Labor Board], they have the same indisputable right to work that others have to decline to work.

And later in the same proclamation:

These activities and the maintained supremacy of the law are the first obligations of the government and of the citizenship of our country.

In line with the letter and spirit of these official utterances the railroads assured the men who remained with them that their loyalty would be recognized and all their service rights maintained. To the new men who found opportunity for employment in the vacancies created by the strikers' abandonment of their work the railroad executives gave assurance that they would not be displaced to make way for returning strikers. In the case of the Southern Pacific, the general manager, in a bulletin to shop craft employees, dated July 7th, said:

It comes to my attention that strikers and their paid leaders are spreading false propaganda that our shop craft men now at work will be displaced later on by men now on strike. Nothing could be further from the truth. Our shop craft employees have my promise that there will not be at any time any understanding or agreement reached with any one that will require their displacement by men now on strike. You have my assurance that shop craft employees who remained loyal, those who returned to service in response to my notice of July 3d, and new shop craft employees will be positively protected against displacement at all times.

In view of these several declarations made officially by President Harding, the Railroad Labor Board, and by railroad executives—for the bulletin issued by the superintendent of the Southern Pacific was practically duplicated throughout the country—it is mere surplusage to say that the general commitment is positive, definite, and as morally binding as words could make it. The obligations of the government and of the railroads alike are first to the men who stayed on their jobs, second to those who came into the service in the places of the strikers. It has become a point of honor binding upon the government and upon the railroads. To yield to the demand of the strikers that they be returned with seniority unimpaired would be a shameful repudiation; and equally shameful would be the submission of the pledges given, and of what may be implied in them, to adjudication. There are some things that may not be compromised. Under the pledges of the government, made through the Labor Board, likewise under pledges made by the railroad executives, the men who remained on the job are entitled to the seniorities they have attained; and the men who came new into the service are entitled to the seniorities established by their service. To nullify these seniorities—and this would be the effect of returning the strikers to their work with seniorities unimpaired—would be an act so shameful that no member of the Labor Board or no railroad executive could at once retain his official place and his self-respect.

Furthermore, repudiation of the pledges given would be fatal to the authority of the Railroad Labor Board. If men may win over the Labor Board by striking, then the determinations of the board become futile.

It would mean that before the Labor Board should hand down a decision it would have to consult the men, since they would have the power to annul any decree. It would signify an authority on the part of the labor organizations superior to that of an agency of government specially commissioned. Also, it would destroy respect of the men for their employers, since it would exhibit them, not only as powerless, but as faithless in relation to solemn pledges.

Really American.

The American Plan in industry is well named. It means, practically speaking, what President Harding meant when he spoke of conditions under which free men, willing to work, may work in safety. It has been in effect in the building industry of San Francisco for a little over a year, and we have thus had sufficient time to observe its results. In regard to the upbuilding of the city and the prosperity of its people as distinguished from the prosperity of a selfish part of its people, those results have been beneficial beyond estimate. Allowing all proper discount of the comparison by reason of changing general conditions, the fact presents itself indubitably that the worst restriction on building was removed when the closed shop was abolished. With that obstruction gone an astonishing energy of development has been released. The building operations for the first six months of 1921, under closed shop conditions, amounted to $11,276,498. For the first six months of 1922, under the American Plan, they were $23,356,239. The gain was more than 107 per cent. If the working class is interested in the expansion of industry and the opportunity for employment, which condition was better for the working people themselves? It has not all been plain sailing, and there is no reason why it should have been. Some conflict of interest is a natural condition of all trade. There have been some strikes of more or less seriousness. But on the whole the building trades have lost nothing substantial, contracts have been executed, the city has enjoyed some share of its natural development. For this the American Plan is to be thanked more than any other factor of the industrial and financial situation. It was inaugurated about the middle of June, 1921, and the curve of building operations started upward in August of that year. Nor is the phenomenon an isolated one. Early this year thirteen of the building trades in Chicago began operations on the American Plan. The result has been that in the first six months of 1922 Chicago building operations aggregated more than $111,000,000, which is greater than for any entire year since the world's fair in that city. These are facts that can not be gainsaid, nor explained on any other basis than the patent one of cause and effect. Liberty and human rights are still the best foundation for the social fabric, still the most healthful condition of industry and life. When any class seeks for its own ends to curtail the liberties of the rest of the community it is making itself a social enemy. The great thing necessary just now is to get all classes of society to see it, and to understand that every individual is interested in the preservation and defense of individual rights. This is the interest of the whole, which is greater than any part. Without that there can be no healthy general progress, no matter what selfish gain there may be to a few. The American Plan is here, and that is the way it works. It is really American.

Editorial Notes.

One of the surprises of the current primary election season is the defeat of Representative Philip Campbell of Kansas. Campbell has represented the Third Kansas District for ten successive terms. He is chairman of the House Committee on Rules and was in line for the Speakership. It had been supposed that in his own district he was invincible. Campbell's defeat is attributed almost solely to his course in relation to the bonus bill, of which he was an ardent supporter and an active promoter on the floor of the House. He had it within his power as chairman of the Rules Committee to block the arbitrary procedure by which the bonus bill was jammed through the House, but he made the mistake of yielding to the clamor of the American Legion politicians to make it privileged legislation. If he did not originate he at least approved and brought into effect a "gag" rule setting a date for consideration of the bill and specifying that only five hours should be devoted to the debate. The opposition was obliged to accept the scheme, but did so under protest. At the time Campbell was subjected to severe criticism, not only on the part of opponents of the bill, but of its friends. Fordney, an advocate of the bonus, but a critic of the method by which it was forced through, declared on the floor of the House, with reference to Campbell, that "a day of reckoning is close at hand when the people will rise up in anger at such high-handed tactics."

The defeat of Mr. Campbell has had a depressing effect upon the bonus campaign. And it is not the only circumstance tending to make an atmosphere of gloom in respect to this particular measure. Two senators—McCumber of North Dakota and Cumberston of Texas—have been repudiated because of their support of the raid. Breckinridge Long of Missouri, Representative Sweet of Iowa, Representative Burke of Pennsylvania, and Representative Jefferies of Nebraska have failed to win nominations because of their support of the bonus. Representatives Ireland and Copley of Illinois, Representative Dunbar of Indiana, Representatives Connell, Focht, Rose, Brooks, Jones, McLaughlin, Walters and Reber of Pennsylvania, Representative Campbell of Kansas and Representative Herrick of Oklahoma will not return to the House because they failed to properly represent their constituents on this issue. On the other hand, Senators Pepper of Pennsylvania and Swanson of Virginia, both opposed to the bonus, have been renominated by large majorities. Representative Alice Robertson of Oklahoma, Representative Garrett of Tennessee, Representative McFadden of Pennsylvania, Representative Garner of Texas, Representative Sears of Florida, and Representative McArthur of Oregon, all of whom opposed the bonus, have been renominated.

It is now demonstrated that whatever may be our policy with respect to the billions owed to us by our European allies, payment is not to be forthcoming in a form or within time to make these credits a resource for payment of the proposed soldiers' bonus. The only way to raise money to pay the bonus is by special taxation, and this may not be arranged for without distinct violation of the promise of reduced taxation to which the Administration stands committed. President Harding has not swerved from his position to the effect that any measure providing a bonus must also provide the means of paying it; and nobody has been able to figure out how this may be done without imposing on the public new and onerous forms of taxation in direct contempt of party promises.

There are to be submitted to the California electorate in the coming November election thirty measures under the referendum, ranging from a proposal to create a bond issue of $500,000,000 for development of hydro-electro power by the state to creation of a special examining board for osteopaths. It would take a dozen Philadelphia lawyers from now until election day to properly study, classify, and annotate these proposed measures. That the voters of the state shall be able to act with intelligent judgment upon them is of course unthinkable. A safe rule will be for the individual voter to mark his ballot "No" in every instance.

Senator Reed of Missouri is not a profound man, and he is assuredly not a great statesman. His chief merit is courage. That is the basis of his standing with his constituency in Missouri. A contributory fact tending to his success was the effort of ex-President Wilson to read him out of the party and to bring about his defeat. The Democrats of Missouri—and presumably of the country at large—are obviously not willing to accept the ex-President as the dominating head of their party. Reed's chances of election in November are good. The state is nominally Democratic, though it gave Roosevelt a majority of 25,000 in 1904, Taft a majority of a few hundred in 1908, and Harding a plurality in 1920. The late contest between Reed and Long has had a stimulating effect upon Missouri politics. It has stirred waters that had become stagnant, and has reminded the people that there are things worth contending for, with the further principle that a man of courage and resource may not stand in fear of those who assume to speak in the name of prestige and authority.

The primary campaigns throughout the country have demonstrated for the hundredth time the futility of laws restrictive of expenditures in primary elections. There is no way by which a candidate may advertise himself before a state and afford voters sufficient information to act intelligently unless he shall spend—himself or others for him—considerable amounts of money. Either a candidate must be widely exploited, and at very considerable cost, or the electorate must be left uninformed of his principles and his qualifications. The condition is by no means an ideal one, but it is what it is, and nobody has suggested any method of improving it. Experience has made plain the fact that the direct primary is more costly to candidates and more generally demoralizing than the old convention system with all its demerits.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

SOME PERTINENT REFLECTIONS.

Concerning the Relationships of the Central Pacific Railroad to the Interests of California.

In a widely-circulated letter Mr. F. G. Athearn, local attorney for the Union Pacific Railroad, urges acceptance of the Supreme Court decree "unscrambling" the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific properties, and arguing—upon the presumption that the Central Pacific will go to the Union Pacific—that great advantage will accrue to California. To this letter Mr. R. H. Swaine, the well-known shipping man, has replied as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, August 9, 1922.

Mr. Fred G. Athearn,
Attorney for the Union Pacific R. R. Co.,
San Francisco, California—

DEAR SIR: Your very interesting views on the separation of the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads, which you were kind enough to send me, have been carefully read, and I take the liberty of writing you some of my views on the same subject.

I was particularly struck by your remark at the outset that "the Central Pacific begins at Ogden, Utah, and runs to the Oakland Mole on the eastern side of San Francisco Bay." I believe that this is the commonly accepted idea in the Eastern and Middle Western states. I suppose it is natural enough, and I have no doubt the general policy of the Union Pacific Railroad has been based on this assumption, as I have often noticed evidences of it in my business experience. The head office of the Union Pacific and the head offices of the principal or connecting or feeding railroads with which it connects are all located in the principal cities of the Middle Western states, or else in New York. This, of course, is where their great business originates and where their interests lie.

Contrary to your view, I know, and I think most Californians know, that the Central Pacific begins on the eastern side of San Francisco Bay, at the Oakland Mole, and runs to Ogden, Utah. I am of the opinion that the officers of the Southern Pacific have the same belief, and their policy in the past has been based upon it, and I have often noticed evidences of it in my business experience. Now, I consider that this viewpoint is of the highest importance; in fact, taken in connection with the results that arise from it, it is of the very first line. The question of competition, since the passage of the Transportation Act of 1920, does not seem to me to be of very much importance. However, it may be that to the Middle Western or Eastern man this competition is important, and that the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific are competing lines; but, to us in California, they are not competing lines, and never have been, and the suggested competition today amounts to nothing.

On the other hand, to me and to most Californians, the important matter, as the situation exists today, is the policy and ownership of these lines. The headquarters and interests of the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific lines have been identical and have always been strictly Californian. They have always been California institutions, beginning in California and interested in the upbuilding of California, and to me this is everything. I might interpolate here, speaking of California, that there are many of us who think that the natural resources of the state are greater than those of Italy, and, as you know, Italy supports a population of 40,000,000; it does not seem to be a wild assumption to assume that we will one day have as many. California, facing the Pacific Ocean, is the front door of the United States, and the great commerce that will come to our shores will be carried and distributed eastward, southward, and northward by our railroads as far as economic conditions will permit. This has long been the vision of Californians, and also the vision when the Central and Southern Pacific railroads were built, and when the Panama Canal was constructed. There is every indication that these views will come to pass, and, if this is so, then the railroads running to the east, and north, and south are our great distributing avenues, and I see no competition in these diverse directions between the Central and Southern Pacific railroads.

I can see competition between the Western Pacific and the Central Pacific—they are both Eastern distributing avenues, and both fortunately have their headquarters here; both begin here, and both have similar interests, and both are really Californian. I can not find that we have any special interest in the Union Pacific, any more than we have in any of the other Middle Western railroads whose interests lie in the Middle West and who now are able to route their business over the Central Pacific. It is to us mainly a question as to what portion of the Union Pacific territory and that traversed by other Middle Western railroads is within our economic possibilities, and to which we may look for growth.

On the other hand, you must remember we now reach the great Mississippi Valley through the Panama Canal and the barge service on the Mississippi River, making us more or less, or, I might say, largely independent of the Middle Western railroads. In other words, we are a maritime state looking out over the Pacific, which is to be the scene of great trade development of the future; and we are interested in the railroads over which we can reach out from here, and, in so far as these compete, to use the competition to our own benefit, all we know how; but, remember that the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific start here in California, just as the New York Central starts in New York; and it is my view that, if the Central Pacific should be separated from the Southern Pacific, then we in California should raise the money, buy the stock, and own it here. Its ownership should never go to Omaha, or Chicago, or any other Western cities whose interests are not and can not be identical with ours, but, on the contrary, whose highest interests lie in developing their territory and, incidentally, to exploit our state as far as they can.

sific in extending its line to the Northwest. You must be aware that when they did that no benefit accrued to us in California, but, on the contrary, it was entirely in the interests of the upbuilding of the Union Pacific and the great territory over which it reaches. If California is to grow, as we think it will, the purchase of this stock should be a good investment, and, if it is ever offered for sale, I, for one, will gladly buy my share of it. Furthermore, in the interests of California, it would be highly advisable that we should not only have the Central Pacific keep its headquarters and its interests in California, and, if possible, be owned in California, but it is also to our interests that the steamship lines that ply between California ports and the Far East should be owned and centered in California, particularly does this apply to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and we should also own and operate from San Francisco at least one line between the Pacific Coast and the Atlantic Coast.

In other words, it is advisable for Californians to have a very important interest in the ownership of the great transportation systems that are necessary for our growth; and that these transportation systems should have their headquarters and their interests here in California. This applies to both the land and the sea—the railroads and the steamship lines. They are just as necessary and important to us as a delivery wagon is to a dry goods store. You know what New York and the country adjacent has become; what a trade and manufacturing centre; how the products arrive and depart by sea and by rail; and how their rail and steamship lines are owned and centered there. We have similar hopes, and it seems obvious that our transportation systems must be centered here, and not in Omaha or Chicago or New York.

Perhaps my experience, confined largely to shipping as it has been, has made me somewhat provincial, but I certainly think the Central and Southern Pacific do not compete, and I hope the Central Pacific will continue to begin on the east side of San Francisco Bay, and that it may never be the tail of the Union Pacific kite, or California become the back door of the Middle West.

Yours very truly,
R. H. SWAINE.

A Word From Bakersfield.

BAKERSFIELD, August 10, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I have read and reread and recommended others to read your editorial on President Harding—"A Man and His Work." It is both forceful and fitting and is full of pathos and power. It abounds with telling truths and touching tenderness. It is written in your best classic style and will be an imperishable tribute to our worthy President.

Doubtless you read his recent Marion speech and noted his unique remarks in regard to the Eighteenth Amendment: "The minority is being denied a fancied sense of personal liberty, but the amendment is the will of America and must be sustained by the government and public opinion," etc. No trace of weakness or indecision there. The President, a man of character and courage, has spoken, and the country is sitting up and taking notice. Some one has said that the best way to kill a bad law is to enforce it. Let those who think the Eighteenth Amendment is a bad law help its destruction by urging its enforcement. Patriotism prompts it, fairness demands it, and the President seriously and sternly invites it.

I have been a supporter of Senator Johnson since he commenced his political career, but his vagrant associations and wanderings with Hearst and Hylan, La Follette and De Valera, etc., and his lack of support generally of President Harding's administration has decided me in favor of Mr. Moore, who has already demonstrated his weight and worthiness by an unblemished life and by his wonderful business ability in engineering that peerless and only self-paying exposition ever held.

Mr. Moore is a man of large vision; a clear thinker and a proven doer of great things. From his past we have the right to believe and expect that he will benefit the nation as a senator even more than he has benefited California as a private individual. Let us put him to the test by electing him senator.

CHARLES MORRICE.

Is this democracy, or, simply, anarchy? I sometimes wonder—I am given to wondering—whether this holy experiment, as Penn called it, of democracy would be thought successful by its founders, writes C. Edward Newton in the Atlantic Monthly. When I consider how clumsily we have solved, if indeed we can be said to have solved, our governmental problems, I am inclined to doubt. Washington fought for, and secured for us, a continent. Are we not foolish to be robbed of our noble inheritance by the anarchist and the agitator? In letting down the bars—perhaps it would be more exact to say, in erecting no bars whatever around our possessions—we have placed in jeopardy our most precious institutions, and in exchange we have secured—what? Cheap labor, nothing else. We mistake the rapid exploitation of this continent for a logical operation of democracy.

When any body of men becomes so infatuated with their own special interests that they defy the laws of the land with impunity and are ready to assault and murder any who differ with them they have become a menace to the existence of democracy or any other form of free government, and their fellow-citizens must gravely consider how to protect the liberties which our Constitution is designed to secure.—Former Attorney-General George W. Wickersham.

Until electricity was discovered, the cause of the aurora borealis was unknown, and it was supposed to be of supernatural origin. Even today its exact composition or source is more or less of a mystery, but it is generally supposed that it is caused by the recombination of positive and negative electricity. It exists only in the regions of the poles, although its light is seen to a moderate degree over the greater part of the earth.

Since the passage of the Dyer anti-theft automobile law in October, 1919, 2120 automobiles, worth at a fair second-hand valuation $2,567,208, have been recovered by the Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, according to figures compiled by that bureau at the request of officials of the American Automobile Association.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Marguerite Waltz has the distinction of being Philadelphia's only policewoman. Her duties consist in supervising the conduct of all affairs which concern the welfare of young girls.

La Fayette's great-grandson, the Count Charles de Chambrun, has recently arrived in Washington, D. C., to act as chargé d'affaires at the French Embassy during the absence of Ambassador Jusserand.

Walter Littlefield has recently been honored by King Victor Emmanuel III with the rank of Officer of the Order of the Crown of Italy. The distinction was conferred in recognition of Mr. Littlefield's studies of Dante, which have appeared in various publications.

Sir Francis Younghusband has been presented with the Charles P. Daly medal for this year. The presentation occurred at the American Embassy in London and the medal was inscribed "For explorations in Northern India and Tibet and for geographical explorations on the Asiatic and African borders of the empire."

Augustus Thomas, playwright, has been recently appointed chairman of the Producing Managers' Association, a post corresponding to that of Will Hays in the motion-picture industry, Judge K. M. Landis in organized baseball, and Franklin D. Roosevelt in the construction industry. Thomas has signed a three years' contract.

Ales Broz, economic and industrial expert from Czecho-Slovakia, is a new attaché at that country's legation in Washington. Broz, who comes from diplomatic services in London, brings to his new task a wide knowledge of the facts on which American interests are seeking information. Broz is optimistic over the outlook for his country and claims that she has gone further in reconstruction than her neighbors.

Captain Lemuel Cornick Shepherd, U. S. M. C., has recently announced his resignation as aide-de-camp at the White House simultaneously with the announcement of his engagement. One of the unwritten laws of the White House is that junior aides must be bachelors, as one of the duties implied is being "nice" to women guests at the executive parties. The rule is said to have had its origin in the protest of an indignant wife of a gallant aide.

Gifford Pinchot, candidate for governor of Pennsylvania, is notably an outdoors man. Though more than six feet tall he does not look vigorous, as he is slender to the point of emaciation and is rather narrow in the shoulders. However, he plays tennis, is a good shot, an ardent fisherman, and can ride or tramp with any one. His profession of forestry has taken him much in the open, and it is said that many a Western ranger, cowpuncher, miner and guide can testify to Mr. Pinchot's brawny strength. Harpooning swordfish is probably his favorite sport and accomplishment.

Miss Florence King, Chicago lawyer, is the choice of the women of the Republican party for judge of the new district court in Chicago. Miss King, accompanied by some of her supporters, recently called on President Harding at the White House, but the President's attitude toward the suggestion that Miss King be appointed the first of her sex to sit on the Federal bench of the United States has not yet been published. The judgeship suggested is in the new district provided for Chicago and is in accordance with an act recently approved providing for amplification of the Federal judiciary.

Admiral Baron Tomosaburo Kato, the new "non-party" prime minister of Japan, though he is said to have the silent support of the nation as a whole, yet takes office in the midst of a chorus of disapproval from professional politicians. Kato, who is the reverse of a publicity-seeking politician, always shuns the limelight. When he was appointed minister of the navy six years ago he hid all marks of his rank and traveled incognito during his official trips. Unlike most of the men of his class, he has ignored petty accomplishments. The Japanese of his station pride themselves on beautiful writing, but Kato is an exception. Simplicity and economy are the keynotes of his character. Kato's pet aversion is green tea, which all Japanese drink, because he claims that tea drinking interferes with his sleep. Kato's sister, now eighty-three years old, says that as a little boy the premier was quick tempered and prone to fight the neighborhood children.

Lord Northcliffe, 1st Viscount, of St. Peter in the County of Kent, as his full title reads, who died in London August 14th, was born July 15, 1865, in County Dublin, the son of an English barrister. The history of his life is practically that of his paper, the Daily Mail, and the several others of which he was part owner, notably the London Times, which he largely controlled for the last twelve years of his life. Though Northcliffe devoted his life to newspapers and consistently refused official positions, he played a prominent part in British politics. He was particularly anathema to the Germans, partly as a result of his superintendence of enemy propaganda during the war. In fact he was honored by a special German medal struck of him as the "moulder of the English mind." His war-time services to Great Britain were probably more valuable than those of any other man except his friend and enemy, Lloyd George.

He was chairman of the British war mission to this country in 1917 and the same year was made director of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee. Northcliffe's early years were spent in devising schemes to found a fortune and it is a notable fact that at the age of twenty-three he had acquired enough money to buy his first publication, the Weekly Answers. The venture was an immense success and was the foundation of his career and the first of the forty-odd papers the millionaire proprietor was to own. Though he died of overwork at the premature age of fifty-seven, Northcliffe was the first publisher to mitigate the labors of his men by shorter working weeks.

OLD FAVORITES.

Carcassonne.

(Translated from the French of Gustave Nadaud, 1820-1893, by M. E. W. Sherwood.)

"How old I am! I'm eighty years!
I've worked both hard and long,
Yet patient as my life has been,
One dearest sight I have not seen,—
It almost seems a wrong;
A dream I had when life was new,
Alas, our dreams! they come not true:
I thought to see fair Carcassonne,—
That lovely city, Carcassonne!"

"One sees it dimly from a height
Beyond the mountains blue,
Fain would I walk five weary leagues,—
I do not mind the road's fatigues,—
Through morn and evening's dew.
But bitter frosts would fall at night,
And on the grapes,—that yellow blight!
I could not go to Carcassonne,
I never went to Carcassonne.

"They say it is as gay all times
As holidays at home!
The gentles ride in gay attire,
And in the sun each gilded spire
Shoots up like those of Rome!
The Bishop the procession leads,
The generals curb their prancing steeds.
Alas! I know not Carcassonne,— Alas! I saw not Carcassonne!"

"Our Vicar's right! he preaches loud,
And bids us to beware;
He says, O, guard the weakest part,
And most the traitor in the heart
Against Ambition's snare!
Perhaps in autumn I can find
Two sunny days with gentle wind,
I then could go to Carcassonne,—
I still could go to Carcassonne!"

"My God and Father! pardon me
If this my wish offends!
One sees some hope, more high than he,
In age, as in his infancy,
To which his heart ascends!
My wife, my son, have seen Narbonne,
My grandson went to Perpignan;
But I have not seen Carcassonne,—
But I have not seen Carcassonne!"

Thus sighed a peasant bent with age,
Half dreaming in his chair;
I said, "My friend, come go with me
Tomorrow; then thine eyes shall see
Those streets that seem so fair."
That night there came for passing soul
The church-bell's low and solemn toll,
He never saw gay Carcassonne.
Who has not known a Carcassonne?

The Song of the Camp.

"Give us a song!" the soldiers cried,
The outer trenches guarding,
When the heated guns of the camps allied
Grew weary of bombarding.

The dark Redan, in silent scoff,
Lay grim and threatening under;
And the tawny mound of the Malakoff
No longer belched its thunder.

There was a pause. The guardsman said:
"We storm the forts tomorrow;
Sing while we may, another day
Will bring enough of sorrow."

They lay along the battery's side,
Below the smoking cannon;
Brave hearts from Severn and from Clyde,
And from the banks of Shannon.

They sang of love, and not of fame;
Forgot was Britain's glory:
Each heart recalled a different name,
But all sang "Annie Laurie."

Voice after voice caught up the song,
Until its tender passion
Rose like an anthem, rich and strong,—
Their battle-eve confession.

Dear girl, her name he dared not speak,
But as the song grew louder,
Something upon the soldier's cheek
Washed off the stains of powder.

Beyond the darkening ocean burned
The bloody sunset's embers,
While the Crimean valleys, learned
How English love remembers.

And once again a fire of hell
Ran on the Russian quarters,
With scream of shot, and burst of shell,
And bellowing of the mortars!

And Irish Nora's eyes are dim
For a singer dumb and gory;
And English Mary mourns for him
Who sang of "Annie Laurie."

Sleep, soldiers! still in honored rest
Your truth and valor wearing;
The bravest are the tenderest,—
The loving are the daring. —Bayard Taylor.

RECREATIONS OF ANATOLE FRANCE.

Paul Gsell Plays Plato to the Dean of French Literature.

It is something of a paradox for the most lucid writer of the most explicit modern tongue to stand in need of an interpreter, and yet Paul Gsell has performed an invaluable service in recording "The Opinions of Anatole France." Whether or not either of the clear Gallic minds concerned in this exposition was struck by the irony of it is not recorded. M. Gsell is a charming, we assume middling young, Frenchman who worships genius. Some years ago he gave us the splendid "Art," which expounded Rodin's opinions and philosophies. There was a crying need for that, since Rodin has always been misunderstood, and though there may have been less call for an interpretation of France, the book is even more delightful. Besides, "The Opinions of Anatole France" is more than an exposition. It is an intimate portrait.

Though every reader of "Les Contes de Jacques Tournébroche" must realize France's predilection for a racy story, it yet comes as something of a surprise that the greatest French intellect is as inveterate an anecdotalist as an American toastmaster. The only difference is that all of France's stories are good, as one gleefully realizes when "The Opinions of Anatole France" gradually resolve themselves into a steady stream of anecdote. He has a story for everything and they are all beautifully to the point. They are not given on the principle Mr. Leacock has found us guilty of—an eye for an eye and a story for a story. In defense of our national pastime, we maintain that one bad story deserves another.

Several of France's best are concerned with the corrupt politics of the French Academy. The legitimate system is very simple. An eligible wishes to join the Academy and sends the august body a letter of application and they, when there is a seat vacant, vote on the several applicants. Several such were beseeching France for his vote. It seems that the greatest luminary of the French Academy rarely goes near it. He declined to vote for his friends, but gave them quantities of advice:

France—But most of the time, as you know, my dear friend, as well as I do, the elections are purely political.

Haracourt—Yet, my dear master, your own was not!

France—On the contrary, it was so more than any other. But the story is worth telling in detail.

Ludovic Halévy, who loved me like a brother, kept constantly saying: "Why sulk at the Academy? It is the thing to join. It looks well on the covers of one's books. Present yourself. Do it for my sake. I am ashamed to be an immortal when you are not." Well, the end of it was that I drew up my letter of application, and went to read it to him.

"Tut, tut!" said he, "your letter is not in due form. Give it to me and I will arrange it properly." And he deliberately inserted three or four fearful mistakes in French, which stood out like poppies in a corn field.

"There," he said, "is the style required. But that is not everything. We must find out who will vote for you."

He drew up a list and proceeded to tick off a great number of names.

"Hm! Hm!" he muttered, "it will not be easy. These damned aristocrats will make wry faces when they have to swallow you."

I began making my calls. Halévy directed operations. Every morning I received a note: "Go to So and So! Call again on So and So!" All the time he was consumed with anxiety. Finally, one day when I saw him he was radiant.

"That's all right!" said he, rubbing his hands, "we've got them!"

"Got whom?"

"The aristocrats! Listen. There are two seats vacant. The extreme Left of the Academy is putting you forward for one. The aristocrats have a candidate for the other, a worthy nobleman of ancient lineage, but an absolute illiterate. They will not find it easy to push him through."

"We said to them: Do you want the extreme Left to vote for your nobleman? Then, vote for the anarchist, Anatole France."

The "anarchist" thus engineered into the sacred precincts of the Academy maintains that the works of the candidates are never read. One infers that if he himself and his politics had not been so well known, the Academy would have been sublimely ignorant of the fact that he was an anarchist. Le conte de Lisle, the "blasphemer who wrote 'Poemes Barbares,'" was elected as a Christian poet. Says France, "The majority of the immortals who voted in his favor, I am told, attributed to him Sully Prudhomme's 'Le Vase Brisé.'" Still on the trail of the Academy's negligence, M. Gsell tells the following yarn:

Some one told the story of the scurvy trick played by the author of "Les Origines de la France chrétienne" on Monsignor de Cabrières, who was a splendid orator, but had written practically nothing.

Monsignor Duchesne had gone into several bookshops near the Mazarin Palace, and had said in the most innocent tones:

"Give me the complete works of Monsignor de Cabrières."

The shop assistants were amazed.

"The complete works of Monsignor de Cabrières? We haven't them in stock."

"Oh, yes, you must have. Have a look!"

They searched and then:

"We can not find them, Monsignor."

"Come now, Monsignor de Cabrières is a candidate for the Academy. He must have surely written something, and I want particularly to read his books. Look again, please."

Great commotion. The owners and their assistants searched everywhere, moving piles of books and climbing ladders. But still there was nothing.

"We are very sorry, Monsignor!"

"So am I! So am I!"

As he went out he raised his hands to heaven.

"Where, oh, where shall I find the complete works of Monsignor de Cabrières?"

Nor is its present state the result of modern degeneracy. As every one knows, women are not as yet allowed to become members of the Academy, though if Mme. de Noaillet is successful in her fight they soon will be. But they have always been eligible for prizes. Perhaps it is because Frenchmen realize that the introduction of women would make corruption even more corrupt that they so assiduously bar them. At least, here is Anatole France's authentic story apropos of their refining influence:

France—Under the Second Empire Louise Colet was a majestic female, very beautiful, rather a virago, with a man's voice, and eyes which she knew how to use. She was married to a very ugly little dwarf, who played the violin at the Conservatory. The great philosopher, Victor Cousin, when he saw her, discovered in her the Good, the True, and the Beautiful. He reduced the little violinist to the same plight as Sganarelle. It was the correct thing to do.

Louise Colet used to twang the lyre. She asked her metaphysician to have some poetry prizes awarded her by the French Academy. How could Cousin refuse such a modest recompense for divine hours? So, every year that God granted, Louise Colet used to get her prize. It was as regular as clockwork.

On one occasion the good lady began rather late to manufacture her piece for the competition. The night before the last day for receiving entries she had not hatched a single line. She was greatly embarrassed.

That night there were some artists and writers at her dinner table. It chanced that Flaubert and Bouilhet had come. They were fond of her, because she was an amiable creature and made everybody feel comfortable. After dinner she showed them into a corner of the drawing-room.

"My dears," said she, "you must save my life." And she revealed her predicament.

"Now you must be very nice. Follow me into my study."

"... This way. . . . Plant yourselves in those two excellent armchairs, and before midnight run me off two hundred lines on Immortality. That is the prescribed subject. Here are some paper and ink. . . . Oh, I was nearly forgetting! You will find tobacco and brandy in this cupboard." As a matter of fact, it was her custom to smoke and drink like a trooper.

Then she rejoined her other guests.

The two friends smoked and drank and chatted.

"By the way," cried Bouilhet towards 11 o'clock, "what about Immortality?"

"Oh, damn!" replied Flaubert.

And they returned to the brandy.

At a quarter to 12 Bouilhet begged Flaubert to begin to think about Immortality. Flaubert was still reluctant, but suddenly, seizing a copy of Lamartine on a shelf, he opened it at random. "Write this!" he ordered imperiously. And without stopping he dictated two hundred lines from "Les Harmonies."

When it was finished:

"Add the title: Immortality! . . . Excellent!"

He was putting "Les Harmonies" back when Louise Colet appeared.

"Is it finished, my treasures?"

"Oh, yes. Certainly," said they, very lively.

She ran over the sheets of manuscript without recognizing Lamartine.

"You did not over-exert yourselves," said she, "but it will do, all the same. You are angels."

She gave them each a kiss. She presented her poem and got the prize, as usual, with many congratulations. The lines from Lamartine were printed over the name of Louise Colet. Nobody was any the wiser, for nobody read them.

Flaubert did not reveal the trick until very long afterwards.

But if the political morals of the Academy are not unimpeachable, neither, it appears, is its intellect. Part of the function of the Academy is the preservation of French grammar. In fact to be eligible one must be a grammarian, a fact that has hitherto been an unexplained marvel to us. Most educated Englishmen or Americans, eligible for distinguished honors, are not philologists. We have taken off our hats to the French that in addition to being distinguished their great men had time to become grammarians. We thought it was a gift. But the following story leaves us with one less than the proverbial nine marvels:

We never got any further than the letter A, for they do a very short day's work at the Academy. The entry after Anneau (Ring) was being made, and the Duc de Broglie was presiding. By a majority of votes the following definition was adopted:

"Ring: a piece of metal circular in shape."

"Smoke ring," I whispered insidiously.

These words caused some disturbance, but a grammarian replied with great assurance:

"All right. We will put: by catachresis: smoke ring."

Catachresis seemed to be a sublime idea.

As an example, the Ring of Saturn was quoted.

"The astronomers have discovered several of them," I observed.

"So you will have to say the Rings of Saturn."

"No," they said, "it is customary to say the Ring of Saturn."

We are here only to ratify usage. So much the worse for your astronomers!"

We regret the impossibility of finishing M. France's history of his election. The foregoing paragraph is sufficient to illustrate our point and the remainder is another story. In fact, many of the best anecdotes in this ultra-Gallic book are not suitable for publication in an American periodical. But here are two on Rodin that might appear anywhere and are only too good to be true. One is naturally qui vive to see the effect of the two greatest exponents of their respective arts upon each other. The lesson learned is that even the great are not above human jealousies. Elsewhere in "The Opinions of Anatole France" we have discovered the virile malice of France, so the two Rodin stories should be taken with a grain of salt:

Rodin was doubtless greatly flattered by the visit of M.

Bergeret. Yet, these two prophets did not profess unreserved admiration for one another. In private conversation Anatole

France is in the habit of commenting freely upon the inspiration of the celebrated artist.

"He is a genius. I am sure of it. I have seen some nudes of his, palpitating with life. But he is not one of those great decorators such as France has known, especially in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He seems to me to know nothing of the science of grouping. Above all, it must be said, he collaborates too much with accidents."

M. Bergeret explains what he means by these rather cryptic words:

"He abuses his right to destroy what is not perfect in a work. Dear old President Fallières, who was one day paying an official visit to the Salon, stopped in front of a statue which had neither head, nor arms, nor legs, and said, with great simplicity:

"'M. Rodin is certainly a great man, but his furniture removers are singularly careless.'"

A further example of "collaborating with accidents" is the following:

"Do you know how he conceived that Victor Hugo, the half-reclining figure in marble in the gardens of the Palais-Royal? This is the story:

"Rodin had just finished in clay an imposing statue of the poet. Victor Hugo was standing upright on the crest of a rock. All sorts of Muses and Ocean deities were circling about him. One morning the sculptor brought a whole troupe of journalists to his studio, that they might contemplate the new work. Unfortunately, the evening before, he had left the window open, and, as a terrible storm had broken out during the night, a stream of water had reduced the huge group to formless pulp. The cliff had collapsed upon the dancing deities. As for Victor Hugo, he had flopped down into a sea of mud.

"Rodin opened the door, and allowed his guests to go in first. Suddenly he beheld the disaster. He all but tore his beard with despair. But the chorus of praise had already begun:

"'Wonderful! Marvelous! Formidable! Victor Hugo rising from this bed of slime, what a symbol! Master, it is a stroke of genius! You have tried to represent the ignominy of an epoch in which the inspiration of the bard alone survived, noble and pure. How beautiful!'

"'Do you think so?' Rodin asked timidly.

"'Of course! It is the masterpiece of masterpieces. Oh! Please, Master, leave it as it is!'

The story is certainly piquant. . . . Si non è vero. . . .

Probably because he is on his old grazing grounds, M. Gsell, having done duty to his present hero's reaction to Rodin, turns with considerable alacrity to record Rodin's weighty if not witty truths:

Rodin—Yes; nowadays this mechanical process is commonly employed by our sculptors. They are satisfied to make casts of living models. The public does not know this yet, but in the profession it is an open secret. Modern statues are nothing more than casts placed on pedestals. The sculptor has nothing more to do. It is the maker of plaster-casts who does all the work.

France—Allow me to ask a question. I quite understand what you say when the figures of a monument are life size. But what do our artists do when they execute figures larger or smaller than the actual dimensions?

Rodin—There is no difficulty whatever about that, for they have instruments for enlarging or reducing the casts.

France—And in ancient times, you say, the sculptors refrained from making casts of living models?

Rodin—They used casts only for documentary purposes.

Formerly in the studios one saw arms, legs, and torsos, in casts, whose contour was perfect. The artists studied them to check the position of the muscles in their works, but they were careful never to copy them. They always attempted to put life into the models to which they referred, to transform them, to breathe into them their inspiration. It was the Italian, Canova, who began, at the close of the eighteenth century, to incorporate cast pieces into his statues. The great number of commissions which he received forced him to adopt this expeditious method. Since then, his example has been universally followed.

And once in a rather long while M. Bergeret, himself, ceases being either scintillating or Rabelaisian long enough to express a serious opinion on art. And then one is treated to such penetrating criticism as thi-

France—All great authors write badly. That is well known. At least, the pedants say so. Great writers are impetuous. The vigor of their vocabulary, the intensity of their style, the daring of their phrases, disconcert the pedants. To the pundits good writing apparently means writing according to rules. But born writers make their own rules, or rather make none. They change their manner at every moment, as inspiration dictates, sometimes they are harmonious, sometimes rugged, sometimes indolent and sometimes spirited. So, according to the common notion, they can not write well. And why deny it? Rabelais is not free from faults. His litaneies of nouns, his strings of epithets, his lines of verbs, undoubtedly prove his inexhaustible imagination, but they make his style heavy. His phrases often lack suppleness, cadence, and balance.

It would be difficult to find in the old authors more regularity, clarity, and harmony. "Le Ménager," for instance, which was written long before Gargantua, contains some lovely passages about bread, wine, and bees. No doubt the old language creates an illusion, for distance gives an exquisite shade to the things of the past, and we find charm in what had but little for men of an earlier age. Yet, I do not think

I am mistaken. "Le Ménager" is charmingly written. It would be good Rabelais, if it were Rabelais. . . . That is, if it did not lack genius. Similarly, the "Contes" of the Seigneur des Accords are full of charm. His style flows and is a delight to the ear. It is better than that of Rabelais.

Nevertheless, it is Rabelais who is the great writer, and not the Seigneur des Accords.

One of us suggested: Molière also writes badly.

France—Yes, indeed, Molière also writes badly. And so do Saint-Simon, and Balzac and all the others, I tell you! In Molière's time certain writers, Saint-Evremond and Furetière, for example, used a much more polished syntax. They were purer. Only, Molière is Molière, that is to say, not a good, but a great writer.

The foregoing should be used to answer the pedants who find errors of syntax in Shakespeare and Shaw. It also explains why the same pundits never turn out anything great themselves. The moral is: do not aim at perfection. France, himself, the greatest of French literary men, perhaps the greatest of all living men of letters, is supreme by virtue of his supreme indifference. However, we refer the reader, intent on getting the real opinions of Anatole France, to another new book, his

"On Life and Letters." M. Gsell's volume should be called "Recreations of Anatole France."

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending August 12, 1922, were $134,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $117,000,000; an increase of $17,500,000.

There is no indication of a pending change in credit conditions at this time and consequently no reason to expect a change in the trend of money rates, or at least no tightening of rates. Gold holdings of the Federal Reserve system continue to grow and are at a record high level, but there is no corresponding expansion of liabilities in the way of heavier discounts and increased note circu-

All barometers point to a continuation of low money rates and a marked reaction in bond prices can not be counted upon until this condition changes. The investor can gain no advantage by delaying purchases of sound bonds. The following bonds are recommended:

Delaware & Hudson 5½s, 1937, to yield about 5.40 per cent. This issue is outstanding to the amount of $7,500,000 and is a direct obligation of the company, but not secured by mortgage. This road is showing a recovery in earning power and the margin of safety is ample. Dividends have been paid on the capital stock without interruption since 1881 and since 1907 the rate has been 9 per cent. annually.

Louisville & Nashville first and refunding 5½s, Series "A," due 2003, to yield about 5.20 per cent. Amount outstanding $12,753,000, secured by a direct or collateral lien on over 5000 miles, and also by pledge of $28,956,858 of securities. The outstanding funded indebtedness for the road is at the rate of $33,000 a mile, a comparatively low figure. Both equity and the margin of safety of interest payments are large.

"It is not the rich who own the steam railroads, the trolley lines, the telephones, the light and power companies; it is the poor and the people of moderate means, whose aggregate savings are invested in these enterprises," Haley Fiske, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, told the National Electric Light Association at its recent convention. "The 251 life insurance companies doing business in the United States at the end of 1921 had 70,672,959 policies in force, insuring probably fifty millions of individuals. They have the right of fair treatment on the part of supervising and regulating officials. They are the real governing body in a republic and elect legislatures and executives. When a light and power corporation is unfairly treated, it is the people of the community, the voters and their dependents, who suffer. It is their savings that are depleted. Over-taxation, confiscation, failure to help public utilities by refusing to permit adequate rates are robbing them. It is the working people who suffer first when there is lack of service afforded by public utility corporations, because it is they who are chiefly dependent upon such service. It is important that legislatures and members of public commissions should realize these elemental facts. And they should remember that injustice done or permitted by them is injustice, not to the wealthy, but to their own constituents who put them in office."

Leading Chambers of Commerce on the Pacific Coast, important organizations of producers and business men and men of affairs, unite in urging the Interstate Commerce Commission in grouping the railroads under the Transportation Act to keep the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific together, says the Industrial News Bureau.

Those who produce and ship, those who know by actual experience the advantages of unified operation of these lines and the impairment of service that must result from dismemberment combine with those who build and operate railroads in saying that for the common good the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific, built and operated for fifty years as one railroad, shall so continue.

In view of this it is no less amusing than strange that Professor Daggett of the University of California should conclude otherwise.

We don't know how many miles of railroad Professor Daggett has built or operated or whether he has ever built or operated any.

The note recently addressed by Great Britain to the other European powers compels again consideration of those more interesting than interest-bearing debts, due to us from our partners in the great war.

In view of the many misleading statements concerning that document, it may be well to emphasize the point that it does not mean that Great Britain can not pay what she owes us, unless she receives from others what is due to her. She intends to pay in any event.

have advanced throughout the entire period. Corporate needs now seem to be pretty well filled and what might be termed the normal amount of borrowing is likely to rule in the immediate future.

Another unmistakable sign of the abundance of credit and the improbability of any scarcity soon is rising commodity prices. The value of money is determined by the amount of goods it can be exchanged for, and when this amount becomes smaller, as is the case when prices are rising, it indicates that there is an over-abundance of money.

but reminds those who owe her money (more than enough to cover her debt to us) that payment will be extremely burdensome if they continue to treat their obligations to her as a subject that it is ungenerous to mention. As their guarantor, she is prepared to accept full liability in the event of their default.

Unfortunately, this country can not afford to accept payment.

Those best qualified to judge know that impayer will suffer in proportion to his contribution; the sufferings of the receiver will exceed that of all combined.

Yet out of evil oftentimes good is born, and we may live to be grateful to the politicians of today for the long-drawn-out agony to which we seem to be doomed through their ignorance of the elements of economics. The experience may arm us to a resolve to be rid, once and forever, of the whole tribe, long before we have ceased paying for the gratification of their vanity.

All the politicians in the world in one large garbage can would be a sight worth living to see.—Strassburger & Co.

A new issue of $600,000 City of Stockton, California, municipal improvement 5½ per cent. bonds is being offered by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company. The offering is due serially from December 1, 1923, to December 1, 1945. The bonds are tax exempt in California and exempt from all Federal income taxes.

Stockton, incorporated in 1850, is the county seat of San Joaquin County. It is the banking and trade centre of the wonderful northern San Joaquin Valley. It is situated on the main line of three transcontinental railroads, the Southern Pacific, Western Pacific, and Santa Fé, and has water transportation to San Francisco.

Large numbers of investors insist on income returns from whatever they buy, and at the same time they desire a large degree of safety coupled with extremely attractive speculative opportunities.

The inexperienced seldom think of bonds as combining these requirements. Bonds, to them, are low yielding, slow moving, prosaic investments, says Forbes Magazine.

Surprise may be occasioned, therefore, by the statement here that in the bond list at times extraordinarily high returns plus exceptionally well-defined speculative possibilities, and a reasonable degree of safety, are obtainable.

Such opportunities are now to be had among the so-called second grade or speculative railroad bonds.

Railroad bonds of this description are to be preferred above all others in the speculative classification at this time, because of two very important considerations.

First—The entire railroad situation has assumed a new and very promising aspect, from the viewpoint of the investor.

Second—Individual railroad securities can be more definitely and satisfactorily analyzed than any others, because of the wealth of up-to-date statistic data available. The Interstate Commerce Commission requires all roads to issue monthly detailed income statements, and weekly condensed statements of gross and net revenues. Also there are the weekly car-loading statistics by districts, and by individual roads, which furnish an immensely valuable barometer of the trend of freight traffic and earnings.

As already stated, the fact that the general outlook for railroad earnings is so greatly improved—barring, of course, the very remote possibility that strikes will spread and be prolonged to a serious extent—is the chief factor favoring the railroad securities of all kinds.

From a market standpoint, this influence is now the strongest and most direct consideration in the case of second-grade railroad bonds. For they are classified as second grade primarily because the earnings have not been developed to an extent which gives absolute security to the interest payments. Of course, such bonds are rated below first-grade bonds also because of their having a junior lien on properties, but in the majority of cases this junior lien would be of subordinate influence in price provided the earning power had been demonstrated over a reasonably long period, to be in excess of interest requirements. For example: the junior liens of the Atchison or Union Pacific are practically on a basis of equality with the first mortgages of roads whose earning power is less.

With these points in mind, in the following condensed analyses, several of the individual bonds should prove especially interesting.

International and Great Northern 6s are one of the new securities of this road to be issued under the reorganization plan recently adopted.

The road is being retired from its second receivership, and that fact alone is having a prejudicial effect on its securities. But other roads have passed through two or more reorganizations, only to win finally a place among the country's leading transportation systems; so the investor who shuts his eyes to genuinely favorable factors because of prejudices handed down from the past can not certainly justify his position in this case.

While the reorganization has not resulted, as reorganizations usually do, in a reduction of the funded debt, it is nevertheless calculated to put the road in a sound financial position. Besides providing for the payment of various obligations contracted under the receivership for new construction, betterments, etc., the cash raised by the plan will give the road about $4,000,000 working capital.

The interest on the adjustment mortgage bonds is not cumulative until after January 1, 1928, and prior to that time is payable in amounts to be determined by the directors, except that not less than 50 per cent. of the net income must be used to pay the interest, so that it would appear that the bonds are sure of some interest being paid from the start. The first semi-annual payment is due in January.

mediate payment would spell ruin to our industries, unemployment for hundreds of thousands of our workers, and that if the tainted money must be taken—as apparently the politicians have determined—the longer we can put off the evil day, and the smaller the doses into which we can divide the poison, the better it will be for us all. The only way now seems to be for the bankers and industrial magnates of the world to get together as soon as possible and work out some plan by which those who can best afford it shall share the double burden of paying and receiving. for seasonal variations, I. & G. N. is not earning the full interest requirements on its total bonds. It is earning, however, between 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. under the above cited provisions requiring that 50 per cent. of the net income be applied to interest payments on the adjustment bonds, and it is not improbable that before the end of the year increased business will bring the revenues up to a point that will justify the full payment.

Missouri, Kansas & Texas Convertible Adjustment 5s, 1967, is also a "reorganization" bond. The amount issued is $57,500,000. They are a direct obligation of the company and secured by a mortgage on all the property, etc., covered by the prior lien mortgages, but subject thereto. The interest is payable prior to maturity of the principal, only out of net income (before deduction of interest on these bonds), and is cumulative from and after January 1, 1925.

The Missouri, Kansas & Texas is having a very strong comeback in earnings. The current reports indicate that its total interest charges, including the interest on the convertible adjustment 5s, is being earned more than one and three-quarters times. This would indicate that the first interest payment on the bonds, which falls due January 1st next, will be met in full (it is yet to be determined whether payments will be made annually or semi-annually).

This road is in a very favorable position because of the territory covered and because of the fact that the reorganization has provided ample cash for working capital and other immediate requirements. The property comprises a system of nearly 4000 miles, extending from St. Louis to Kansas City, and south to Galveston and San Antonio, Texas, with various branches. The territory is an important mining, agricultural, and oil region. The crop season this fall promises to add materially to the earnings.

Minneapolis & St. Louis Refunding 4s, 1949, are the junior bonds of a road which has never been established as a prosperous enterprise. Perhaps that is because it is too largely dependent on outside lines for its traffic.

The depressed conditions in the mining and lumber industries of the Northwest have had a great deal to do recently with the poor showing in earnings. These conditions are now distinctly on the mend, however, and the outlook is much brighter than it has been for some time.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Now that Anatole France is on the Index Librorum Prohibitorum, or catalogue of books that Roman Catholic discipline forbids the devout to read lest their faith and good morals be jeopardized, his sales will probably bound higher and higher. Always a best seller among intellectuals, he will become a better seller. In addition to that he has joined the Immortals in a yet more distinguished manner than that conferred by the French Academy. It is strange that curses are more effective than blessings, probably because they are more sincere, more wholeheartedly meant, but it is frequently true. One is reminded of Voltaire's banishment, which proved a blessing in disguise. And it is safe to predict that Europe's greatest man of letters will not suffer from the papal decree. It is interesting to note, too, that educated persons may gain permission from their bishop to read the proscribed works. Probably it is just as well. France is not for the masses anyway.

It is not amiss to review the history of the famous index. The record is an institution of a college of cardinals and theologians at Rome, first officially recognized in 1557 by Pope Paul IV, when he caused a catalogue to be prepared by the Inquisition at Rome—a document that is usually referred to as the first Roman Catholic Index, though the custom was traditional in the church. As early as 400 the Council of Carthage had forbidden the reading of pagan authors, and in 1546, eleven years before the custom was crystallized by Pope Paul, the University of Louvain prepared a list of the works that were deemed pernicious, an example soon followed at Venice, Paris, Cologne and other cities. The next step was taken in 1564 by Pius IV, who had Paul's efforts reduced to a regular form by the Council of Trent. And it was later enlarged by Clement VIII. The mechanism which controls the index today was organized in Rome and established by Pius V. Books signaled out for the anathema of the index fall into three categories—books by Catholics opposed to the Catholic faith, books by heretics involving religious errors or treating especially of religion, and all anonymous works spreading pernicious doctrines. So that practically the only way to insure against position on the index is to be a good Catholic.

Even so, Anatole France's proscription is not comparable to Voltaire's, though the analogy is tempting because France's relation to the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is analogous to Voltaire's and the eighteenth. Both were master minds of their eras. But what France has lost in the way of the zest of persecution—Voltaire lived all his life in terror of prison—he has gained in time and comfort. His earlier prototype did not dare to publish under his own name and finally, since his style was unmistakable, did not dare to publish at all. His "Philosophical Letters" from England were burned by the public executioner. It must have been rather disheartening to write in the face of such persistent and efficient malevolence. Voltaire's tribulations and ultimate success have recently been paid homage by the great Scandinavian critic, Georg Brandes. His book on Voltaire has not yet been published in English, but the Living Age, always on the qui vive for the cream of the European press, has printed a few pages of translations from it. We quote below a paragraph indicative of Brandes' critical acumen:

"Once on a time a bundle of nerves surcharged with electricity took Europe captive and enlightened it. Once on a time there lived a man who came to stand for human wit personified, and who to this day maintains that reputation as far as civilization reaches. Once upon a time there was a daemonic genius whose mind struck fire, whose heart warmed to friendship and affection, but whose intellect with all its luminosity was cold, whose art was natural, whose simple eloquence was rarely equaled and never surpassed. Once on a time there lived a man of the world, a business man, a courtier, a landed proprietor, a poet, a scholar, an historian, a hermit, whose very essence was will, whose highest ambition was honor, whose delight was action, whose personality was charm, whose praise as a distinction was eagerly sought by a pope as by an actress, by a king as by a poet, and whose derision was a brand indelible through the centuries. No predecessor, Cicero alone excepted, occupied so central a position in the literature of Europe."

Collectors of the delightful edition of Anatole France published by Dodd, Mead & Co. will welcome the latest volume, "On Life and Letters." Nowhere else is France so delightful as in his essays. His contes have more punch, his novels are both profound and clear, but in reading his miscellaneous critical papers one has the sensation of having at last in a very Sahara of hypocrisy found a well of truth. M. Gsell, whose "Opinions of Anatole France" are reviewed elsewhere in this issue, remarks that the "Garden of Epicure" is his most characteristic and enjoyable work. It is so for the same reason that these papers are so delightful, because in them France's candor is unhampered by plot or plan. It gushes forth to mitigate the universal drouth.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The National Library of Wales has secured at a cost of £5000 what is considered to be one of the finest collections of Celtic romantic literature in Europe.

Henry Arthur Jones has written a study of Bernard Shaw which is to be published in England this fall.

Miss Rose Macaulay, author of "Dangerous Ages," is about to publish a new novel, "Mystery at Geneva." She obtained the necessary local color when she was connected with the secretariat of the League of Nations.

It is reported in Paris that Eleanor Duse will appear there this fall with M. Lucien Guitry in a comedy written for them by Sacha Guitry.

The Macmillan Company has put together a Juvenile Ladder Library for children that should be particularly interesting to parents who are uncertain what to purchase for their offspring. The scheme of the Juvenile Ladder Library includes graded lists of books for children of various ages. It has also been catalogued according to subjects. It starts with folklore and fairy tales for children from four to six years, and carries the lists to children of fifteen years or more. By securing the pamphlet from the Macmillan Company a father or mother may glance through the classifications, alight upon the section to which the child belongs in age, sex, and predilection of subject, and so secure the books best adapted to the young hopeful. Several hundred books are so listed.

A pamphlet containing a sketch of John Galsworthy's life and letters has been published by Charles Scribner's Sons and is offered by them for free distribution.

By ROBERT KEABLE

Author of "Simon Called Peter"

the most widely discussed book of the day

JULIE'S HOMELAND, Africa, is the fascinating background of this powerful novel. Mr. Keable drives home his point with the same forceful presentment of fundamental emotions, the same vivid word-painting, the same utter truthfulness that distinguished his "Simon Called Peter."

THE KEYNOTE of this tremendously human story of the warring of passion and mother love is that the finding of life's goal of happiness is possible only through recognition of the deepest meanings of life for woman.

CONTINUOUSLY INTERESTING, it is also profoundly important to any reader willing to look the facts of life in the face. It is a novel with a difference which sets it apart from all those of which we have grown so tired. Restraint is no longer thrown to the winds.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Man-Size.

Universal interest in the problem of prohibition gives point to William MacLeod Raine's latest book, "Man-Size," whose plot is based on the liquor traffic into the Indian reservations of the Northwest during the last century. The Northwestern Mounted Police put up a substantial resistance to the whisky smugglers of that era. These Centaurs of the law were vigilant in the discharge of their duties—more vigilant than their prototypes of today. The reflection affords food for thought, although the author makes no case for an argument as applied to the present situation. Mr. Raine uses his facts for what dramatic story element he can extract from them. However, there is a moral—it is that whisky will be smuggled into forbidden territory as long as it is made. The chief defect in an otherwise fine story is a rather minor anachronism. Mr. Raine's Westerners of a generation ago are proficient in the argot of the recent war. However, that is a detail. And the reader of adventure stories will undoubtedly enjoy the novel scene and plot of "Man-Size."

MAN-SIZE. By William MacLeod Raine. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75.

A Shepherd's Life.

The vogue for William H. Hudson's books the last year or so has been one of the most promising signs of the literary times. We can not be going quite to the dogs, culturally speaking, while Mr. Hudson is a favorite. Current literature may be pretty bad—somehow it is traditional that it should be. But there are still some good people writing, or perhaps one should say publishing in the present instance. "A Shepherd's Life," while almost entirely new material, is not exactly a new book. One has the impression of its having been written some years ago. And as a matter of fact its material was gathered over a number of years—hence its satisfactory solidity.

The plan of "A Shepherd's Life" is unusual. It is a cross between biography and travel, but is a hundred per cent. Hudson, and admirers of his may safely immerse themselves without fear of the shock of disillusionment. Mr. Hudson, like a certain brand of cigarette, is guaranteed to satisfy. These "Impressions of the South Wiltshire Downs," in addition to being delightfully easy, spontaneous reading, supply one with an insight into a manner of life more indigenous to England than any other phase of existence, and probably less known than any other.

Ravensdene Court.

J. S. Fletcher has given us another of his fascinating detective stories in the novel named above. In fact, after the manner of the Coué formula, this ingenious spinner of detective yarns seems to get "better and better" with every fabrication. He is one of the few writers of this genre who in addition to the sine qua non of a plausible and baffling mystery furnishes the reader also with an interesting slice of humanity and society and serves them with well-written ease.

"Ravensdene Court" is the story of a double murder mystery in remarkable circumstances and is packed with the particular J. S. Fletcher variety of heightened excitement and thrilling episode.

The Pageant of Peking.

De luxe editions are of immediate interest only to collectors, and unfortunately for book lovers in general it is only wealthy collectors who can profit by owning the gorgeous "Pageant of Peking," which is specifically an album of sixty-six unusually fine photographs of Peking by Donald Mennie, accompanied by an explanatory text written by Putnam Weale. Mr. Weale has written other books on China and is generally hailed as authoritative interpreter of the great Eastern republic. He has here traced the history of Peking from the time of the Khitan Tartars to the present day. But authentic as his narrative is, the primary interest of such a book is of course its format and photogravures.

A Virtual Partnership

By the terms of an agreement worked out in conformity with certain regulations laid down by the Railroad Commission, San Francisco and Spring Valley have formed a virtual partnership to increase your water supply.

City and company are associated in a cooperative working relationship, the like of which does not exist anywhere else in the United States.

This working relationship assures ample water to meet the pressing needs of growing population and industrial expansion for many years to come.

The program now being carried out was set forth in a Railroad Commission decision. City and company accepted the program, but the city added certain conditions of its own, and the company agreed to them.

The company carries construction of Calaveras Dam in Alameda County to a height sufficient to add 24 million gallons daily to the water supply.

The city constructs the westerly division of its Hetch Hetchy conduit to convey this Calaveras water to Crystal Springs Lake in San Mateo County.

The company pays for the use of the conduit.

Such, broadly, was the practical and workable solution of our water problem proposed by the Railroad Commission.

The city required, in addition, that the company construct a conduit to carry Calaveras water from its source to the Hetch Hetchy line at Irvington in Alameda County; also that the company pay the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds for the construction of the city's conduit, thus freeing the taxpayers entirely from this burden.

The life of this agreement is for 12 years, and for that period, therefore, San Francisco and Spring Valley will work together to satisfy the demand for more water of our constantly growing community.

"JUST, SUPPOSE."

Romance, this week, and romance yet again! For here at the Columbia is a darling little love lyric of a play, in which the audience, hushed in a romantic ecstasy, hang rapt upon the murmurings of two young lovers, whose love has the beauty that attends a life-long idealization; for it will never reach fruition.

That makes three plays, this week, in which young love murmurs and audiences hang enraptured upon their accents. At the Columbia it is a sweet, sinless love that yet must be renounced; at the Alcazar a love that overcomes obstacles and launches the lovers on the long years of companionship that we see illustrated and working out to a bitter conclusion at the Players. So, on the whole, the love at the Columbia has the more touching beauty of non-fulfillment.

A. E. Thomas is the author of "Just Suppose," which had a very successful run in New York. The author, remembering, perhaps, how popular was the play introduced years ago into this country by Mansfield entitled "Heidelberg," which also shed a romantic glamour about the figure of a young sprig of royalty, conceived the happy idea of making a young visiting prince, whose numerous real names are not given, but whose identity is plainly that of a British prince, enter by chance the precincts of an old Virginia home and fall in love with its rosy-bud inmate.

Of course, as America has helped in making the world safe for democracy, we welcome a prince for a hero with particular fervor. And as, from the point of view of romance we denizens of a republic feel an artless pride in our Southern aristocracy, it pleases us to have the romance thus located.

Mr. Thomas, in common with the majority of American playwrights, is careful to have an atmosphere of delicate and engaging comedy attend and leaven the depiction of his charming story. Both the prince and his lovely innamorata have a keen sense of humor, the girl in particular indulging in delicate railery over what she, with her woman's intuition, sees plainly as a boyish masquerade; and the strenuous efforts of the prince's British dry nurse to make him return to the distracted embassy at Washington provide excellent comedy.

The limited vernacular in which the British youth who is cast in a mold expresses himself was really most enjoyable; every remark that fell from the inspired lips of the Hon. Sir Calverton Shipley being a rare delight. It was also most entertaining to listen to the frenzied and irreverent discourse in which the young peer expressed himself while reproaching and adjuring the dilatory prince for his leishureliness in enjoying his stolen vacation.

It sounded so real. Princes must occasionally relax from their pose on a pedestal, and it can not but be enjoyable for a royal lad to have a pal who isn't afraid to abuse him for indulging in a dangerous and absolutely prohibited lark, and intimate to him in unmistakable terms that he is an expensive nuisance.

The company makes an excellent showing in the representation of the piece. Mrs. Thomas Whiffen presenting, with her ever delicate and unfading charm, a lovely portrait of the ancient gentlewoman who is the grandmother of Linda Lee, for that is the pretty, old-fashioned Christian name of the dainty Southern girl whose youthful beauty and sweetness, set so fittingly in the old colonial home in which she was born and reared, have captivated the young prince.

Isabelle Lowe, with her flaxen locks, her pretty, youthful figure, and a suggestion she managed to convey of sweet, old-fashioned Southernliness, certainly makes a success of her rôle. She has the great fault, however, of cultivating an over-babyish style of speech. Now Linda Lee is not at all babyish, being a girl of considerable dignity of character, much penetration, and a keen sense of humor. I do not believe that a girl with a very keen sense of humor could ever over-stress the babyish manner unless she were doing it for fun.

Isabelle Lowe, however, shows decided cleverness—more than she showed in "Little Old New York"—and conducted herself with a pretty dignity in the interview between Linda Lee and the old diplomat. She can also weep quite plaintively, dilate her eyes bewilderingly, and seem to be what she represented. Yet, to add another criticism, she is not quite sincere enough, there always being more than a touch of artificiality in her acting, which she ought to try to eliminate, for she has enough qualities to make it worth while; delicacy of technique, for instance, as shown in her best work.

Mr. Creighton Hale's appearance is well adapted to suggest the blond, boyish strippling who, as the Prince of Wales, came, saw, and conquered. The actor's very correct line of feature, well-shaped head, boyish build, and blond tints fitted into the rôle; and furthermore Mr. Hale, who had little opportunity to do more than look picturesque and smile fascinatingly in "Little Old New York," reveals himself this week as an agreeable and intelligent actor, able to make love wooingly, to jest engagingly, and to assume at need the dignity of a prince. The only thing that is missing in his representation is the English accent, his intonation being plainly American, although he speaks well.

William Lloyd and Louis Morrison are two actors who greatly strengthened by the excellence of their work the good effect made by the general company. Mr. Lloyd contributing, in the rôle of Sir Calverton, a particularly good brand of comedy which was most hilariously amusing, the actor being very apt in depicting the various emotions—artlessly transparent secrecy, ludicrous apprehension, desperate remonstrance, snubbed repression, and guileless scheming—which tormented the prince's naïve cicerone.

Mr. Louis Morrison as the imposing old diplomat rendered the magisterial dignity and grave and impressive rebuke of that gentleman with immense effect; and John Miljan made the unsuccessful young wooer a likable youth who won sympathy.

Mr. Thomas has written a very engaging play, pleasingly appealing to our—in spite of the cynical ultra-moderns—incongruous delight in romance, yet permeated throughout with delightful humor. The dialogue is pretty and witty, and at times full of dignity; the situations enjoyable, but the author made the mistake of so prolonging the parting scene that it finally reached the point of becoming lachrymose, thus dimming the pleasurable impression made by the previous delectable comedy in as well as out of the love scenes. And indeed the entire last act is a falling-off in merit, for while we accept the possibility and even probability of the young prince's escape, we are unable to conceive of the old diplomat becoming sentimental and deliberately bringing the prince to the gentle and artless Delilah, whose perils charms, we are credibly assured, have enslaved him for life. Being in a gooey mood we are willing for the moment to believe it, but find it difficult to swallow whole a soft-hearted and sentimental diplomat. It's like believing in those weakening detectives, who, in a romantic drama, allow the worthy but unfortunately compromised quarry to escape when he is safely snared, just from benevolence and soft-heartedness; and to make a happy end.

It was up to Mr. Thomas, or so he conceived it, to bring on the wooer in the background, so that we would depart with a comfortable consciousness that Linda Lee would not end as a spinster; and also to relieve the minds of the audience by showing the lovers in a parting embrace. And probably nobody but a jaded critic would question the advisability of allowing that parting embrace.

THE BOHEMIAN CLUB CONCERT.

The annual concert of the Bohemian Club, in which is always presented, not only the music of their annual grove play, written and composed in celebration of their summer jinks, but also striking excerpts from the music of previous plays, is always a social as well as a musical event. There is a happy family atmosphere about it, due to the presence of the club members' womenfolk, who feel, womanlike, immensely privileged at being allowed to share, in a considerable degree, in the sacred revels of the club. For do not famous men come annually from the world's end to share these revels? And so the Tivoli Theatre is always cram-jam full on these occasions, the lordly males not only permitting the fair outsiders and privileged non-members to hear the music—which otherwise it were a shame, so beautiful and elevated it is, to restrict only to the hearing in the annual forest celebration—but they have settled down now to displaying to the deeply-interested spectators a series of photographs showing the happy celebrants either relaxed during their hours of ease or figuring as personages of the play in massed and immensely effective representation under the mighty trees.

The talented Bohemians never fail in securing a new and effective version of the familiar theme: forces of evil assailing the integrity of the noble forests. If we pause to think, it is to realize that annually the club brings, in dramatic and therefore highly effective guise, a realization to both thinking and non-thinking men of the terrible violation of our wonderful redwood groves that continues to go on, while poets write, musicians compose, and artists of the stage represent these continuous violations.

And the politician waxes and grows fat. But the good work has had effect, and the Bohemian Club has had a considerable share in the effect produced on the educated classes.

Mr. Charles G. Norris' play, entitled "The Rout of the Philistines," seemed to be more than usually clear and poignant in its symbolism. Set to most beautiful music, composed by Nino Marcelli, the play and music together furnished a particularly fine example of the quality of the annual grove plays.

Mr. Marcelli's magnetic and inspiring conducting of the excerpts from his score was very much in line with the character of his music, which has a full, pulsing vitality and individuality and the charm of ready and virile imagination. It leads, too, to the high lights which gives the listener many keen thrills, and the stretches of music between seemed to have no dull or perfunctory spots.

In fact, these annual concerts, with their revival of the best musical numbers from previous grove plays, are something to stimulate local pride, so finely dedicated to the highest arts is the talent whose fruits are thus exhibited.

The delighted auditors were treated to lyric excerpts from Humphrey Stewart's "John of Nepomuk," to the beautiful, mystical tone harmonies of Mr. A. Arriola's "Sunrise," from "The Enchanted Forest," and to Mr. W. Beckett's expressive and lovely "Farewell to the Forest."

A son and daughter of San Francisco, Mr. W. S. Rainey and Miss Doria Fernanda, assisted the excellent chorus with the solo selections, both singers displaying good technical voice control and fine volume, while the young tenor also pleased his hearers by infusing an elocutionary charm into his delivery of the words of his numbers.

A CLAIRE KUMMER PLAY.

A romantic drama by Claire Kummer is serving as a magnet to draw to the Alcazar this week appreciators of the New York playwright's fresh, lively, and distinctive humor. For "The Mountain Man," although not claiming to be a comedy, is characterized throughout by that particular brand of playful humor which Claire Kummer has stamped with her own special mark.

"The Mountain Man," however, yields a pleasant surprise by giving us a legitimate right to enjoy its love scenes sentimentally, but with a clear conscience, for they are prettily, wooingly romantic, and yet full of those delightful, individualistic turns of humor which are an essential part of the author's mental make-up. So the audience had a perfectly lovely time hanging fondly over the two leading players, Katherine Van Buren and Dudley Ayres, both of whom are soon to leave them, as this is the last week of the old régime.

It can not be said that as a dramatist pure and simple Miss Kummer shines so much as a caterer in neat, deft, fresh and sudden turns of humor. There seemed to be too much plot to "The Mountain Man," and in two or three short spots in the play we got slightly mixed over motives and relationships.

But who cares! The principal thing is that the play went with fine momentum the greater part of the time, that every love scene was a loganberry tart, because it had sweetness and the pleasant tang that deprived it of all insipidity, and because the two players mentioned were very thoroughly on the job.

Miss Katherine Van Buren, while not showing the high polish of experience, played her pretty part with charming freshness and naiveté, while Mr. Dudley Ayres' sometimes too inexpressive repose caused him to be particularly well adapted to the rôle of "the mountain man," a virile illiterate of patrician ancestry, who, to the dismay of his aristocratic kinsfolk, has unexpectedly become the heir to a fine old family estate. To this character Mr. Ayres successfully gave the manliness, the humor, and the romantic sincerity necessary for its due interpretation.

As may be seen, there is a touch of old-fashionedness to the romance; and indeed I rather got the idea that Miss Kummer had revised an earlier play; one that was written before she had learned that she possessed the peculiarly profitable gift of making New York laugh. This theory, if correct, might account for the somewhat old-fashioned romanticism of the play. But having recently tackled some ultra-modern novels and plays, I discovered that I had a defiant feeling that I still like old-fashioned romance when it is as racy and unsaccharine as Claire Kummer makes it.

While we must concede that our rising young playwrights and fictionists are truthful in their delineations, yet it is a fact that they have a passion for dwelling on the seamy side of human nature. We must have seamy-sidedness to our plays and dramas, and it is better that it be truthful. But they rarely allow us the exhilaration of recognizing the fine grain in many human hearts, and the pleasing exaltation that comes when the contrast is made, and we are released from our long and dreary contemplation of the sty, and are allowed, occasionally, to breathe the purer ether in which the higher qualities thrive.

"The Mountain Man" is just a light, pretty romance, offering no subtle psychology, no food for the intellect; but I tell you, Messrs. the modern novelists and playwrights, that if there is too dark and bitter a flavor to the mental food you offer us, there will be a violent reaction; and we will all be going back to the foolish fairy-tales of romance; and then truth will unluckily have a black eye.

So, messieurs, if you are going to give us the ugly truths—and we recognize that the world, for its own good, must face them—give us the pleasant ones, too; for, after all, though we humans are a bad lot, our poor old sleazy virtues often founded on selfishness and egotism, still, still, gentlemen of the pen, we must continue, for the sake of this tottering world, to believe in virtue and goodness.

There! Wait till I mop my fevered brow. Yes, thank you, I feel better. Let us return to our muttons, which are quite digestible, the sauce being so fresh and wholesome.

"The Mountain Man," as I have intimated, means "The Last of the Mohicans." When its week's run ends the Alcazar will be dark for a week, while the new régime, which means Mr. Thomas Wilkes, known for his divers and successful theatrical activities, will lay out shekels on the complete renovation of the theatre. On August 26th the theatre will open with a brand new company, and Mr. Wilkes will inaugurate his first season here by specializing in successes of the New York stage.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

A. E. Thomas, many of whose plays have successfully appeared in San Francisco in the past, is the author of the Columbia's attraction, "Just Suppose," a three-act comedy romance woven about a family of Virginians and a masquerading royalty.

Isabelle Lowe and Creighton Hale are the co-stars in this production, and Mrs. Thomas Whiffen is seen in the rôle created by her when Henry Miller produced the play in New York.

"Just Suppose" will be offered for a second and last week commencing with next Monday night.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Emma Carus, who has starred and co-starred in so many musical comedies that it would be difficult to enumerate them, brings a number of new songs written by herself and her accompanist, J. Walter Leopold, to the Orpheum next week.

Low Dockstader, "the foremost minstrel comedian," needs no introduction. He has a new line of gab this year which is by far his funniest, entitled "Talking Through His Hat," which was gotten together by that prolific comedy writer, Aaron Hoffman.

Miriam and Irene Marmein present their drama dances, grave and gay, in what is one of the most original and clever terpsichorean turns seen for some time in the West. They are assisted by Ruth Marr and Albert Kirst.

Princess Wah-Letka, an Indian seeress, is one of the most startling mystics in the history of theatrical business. She has proved herself to be amazingly correct in all of her statements.

Roscoe Ails, with Kate Pullman and the band, are a sure-fire hit for snappy entertainment and good laughs.

Billie Burke's "Tango Shoes" are a novelty provoking a great deal of meriment and entertainment.

Humorous Bob Murphy with his great voice and personality has a very "different" act this season.

A series of song impressions are offered by Jean Barrios, who, by the way, is a San Francisco native.

VANITY FAIR.

When Romeo was snooping around Juliet's house getting ready for the balcony scene, he heard her making some remarks of a highly personal nature, and murmuring among other things: "What's in a name?" Because of which, on the intelligent theory that the author believes whatever his characters may express, it is supposed by some that Shakespeare committed himself to the view that there was nothing in a name. But James E. Power knows that there is much in names, and is making a vigorous defense of his. He is postmaster of San Francisco. In becoming postmaster he received a great deal of assistance from Senator Johnson, assistance it would not be wise for him to forget and which he is trying to reciprocate by assisting his benefactor's endeavors not to become ex-Senator Johnson. Also, James E. Power is manager of the Charles C. Moore-for-Senator Mission headquarters, after having been secretary to Executive Secretary McGinnis of the war council of the Knights of Columbus, and before that secretary to Father McElroy of the Boys' Aid Society. Not to prolong the mystery, they are not the same person. James E. Power, grateful Johnsonian postmaster, appears to have resented the fact that his name is being used to make his benefactor an ex-senator. But James E. Power who is trying to make Mr. Moore Senator Moore and Senator Johnson Mr. Johnson says James E. Power is his name, that part of it was his father's and part was bestowed on him at the baptismal font, and he will be dinged if he will give it up for any Johnsonian appointee whatever. He says the name is not copyrighted, and is just as good for him as it is for the postmaster, and he sees no reason why he should not continue to use it, even though he may never draw the larger salary now appended thereto.

It is distressing to see two persons of the same name thus hostile and embattled. They might take a lesson from the bard and say, each to each: "O, be some other name! . . . Romeo, doff thy name; and for thy name, which is no part of thee, take all myself." Or: "Call me but love and I'll be new baptized. . . . My name, dear saint, is hateful to myself because it is an enemy to thee." But no. James E. Power, postmaster, will do nothing of the sort. He numbers his namesake among the Hiram Haters, and will exchange no love words with him. And James E. Power, Moore manager of the Mission, has no endearments for the Johnsonian Power. It is a painful situation. One would think there were enough names in the world to go round without getting the same one attached to two different men, in opposite parties or party factions. If this repulsion goes much farther it is evident that both will soon feel the need Falstaff so keenly felt when he said to the precious young Prince of Wales: "I would to God thou and I knew where a commodity of good names were to be bought." Wherein Shakespeare showed that he did not believe in the doctrine laid down by the rhetorical question of Juliet—or at least that he did not believe it the morning he was writing about that quite dissimilar character, Sir John Falstaff. The latter knew what he needed. So much depends upon the point of view! To Juliet, a name just then was like a cork: an obstruction to be removed. To Falstaff a new name would have been a social clean shirt. Gladly would he have accepted it in lieu of the old one steeped in sin. We commend his unfillable prescription to our Powers. It is the only sure way either can escape the odium he feels should attach to the deeds and political affiliations of the other.

As to material for making the change, it must be confessed that there is something of a shortage if we consider the demand. No matter what name either might take, it would be almost certain to duplicate the name of some one else, at least as to the hinder part. People are born faster than names can be invented for them, and they are beginning to use up even the combinations and permutations of the old. Linguistic corruption helps a little, but not much; and we mind us of the remarkable chapter in Hardy's "Tess," wherein he recites a number of the peasant cognomens of England, which sounded strictly and rurally Anglo-Saxon, but which really were derived from the proudest Norman; such as that of the heroine herself, Darbyville, which came, you will remember, from D'Urberville; and Turner, which Hardy derived by a similar process from Tour Noire, or Black Tower. This appears to be a compliment offered by the author to an entire gens, and rather a stretched one, because the experts say the fact is nothing of the sort; that Turner is a trade name and means just what it says, which is, that the original bearer of it was an honest (or dishonest) craftsman.

Now why such an origin as Hardy gave should be considered a compliment is a mystery of human nature; but it is. Here we are, daily prating about truth, justice, equity, peace, and human rights, and not a moral blitherer among us that would not rather have it thought he was descended from a robber baron that issued from a Black Tower and raided the caravans of the traveling peddlers of mediæval times than that he was descended from a mechanic who made a living for his family by the serviceable art of turning balusters, and table legs, and spindles for Windsor chairs. Why is that? Does Time, among its other tricks, have the power to turn the shameful respectable, and the respectable shameful; to make thievery and murder heroic, and industry a thing to be despised? Or do we really despise work always, as a sign of failure, and admire violence and villainy as signs of power? If we do, are we really democratic? God forbid that we should be really democratic—only, we are always professing to be, and very loudly when we run for public office. It must be confessed that few of us really feel democratic, for ourselves, although we are willing that the other fellow be as much so as he likes. We say we admire honest toil, but how much more do we really admire old pirates—"land pirates and water pirates," and combinations of both sorts. If your name were Morgan, how much prouder you would feel if you thought you were descended from the old Welsh devil that burned Panama than if you thought your main ancestor was just plain Johnny Morgan who played the organ, or worked a farm, or put on "Morgan's Addition to Highland Park." And when an American makes a sudden fortune at the eminently serviceable and valuable occupation of packing pork, or by the doubtfully serviceable activity of speculating in war contracts, he is likely to be looked up by some genealogist willing to discover by sufficient research a blood relationship between the honest pork packer or dishonest contractor, indifferently, and some exceedingly reprehensible character of centuries ago; and if ordinary research fails to discover it, genealogists there are who will apply research until it is discovered, no matter what it may cost the patron. So that in numerous instances it may be said that a man who becomes rich in oil proceeds from geology to genealogy by a well-oiled transition. What he finds himself traced back to will probably be something quite disreputable and murderous, and if a coat of arms can be found to substantiate it his children will emblazon their shame upon the chimney breast for every visitor to see. That is human nature when it has its choice. Civilization is outward and material. It doesn't strike much deeper in than a light case of poison oak.

It is reckoned by the Bureau of Mines that 50,000,000 gallons of gasoline were recovered at refineries in 1921 from the uncondensed still vapors. Such an economy has a strong appeal for motorists, inasmuch as it has a bearing upon the price of the indispensable liquid fuel. But it is further estimated that if a like system were adopted by all refineries more than twice as much in addition might be saved, say 120,000,000 gallons altogether, which would thus be added yearly to the country's total output.

LOUIS HEMON.

Three hundred years ago a young French advocate and historian, Marc Lescarbot, living in the wilderness on the edge of Canada, was appealing to France, "nurse from old of letters," to urge her children to carry their light by frequent voyages to these Western lands and so become "children of the West," says the New York Times. This poet-lawyer painted the lilies of France and the escutcheons of some of her noble families on the rude buildings which the French explorers, Champlain, De Monts, and Poutrincourt, had erected at the verge of the forest solitude and recited Alexandrine verses of welcome, of his own composition, when Champlain and his companions came back wounded and weather-beaten from their voyages down the New England coast.

Nursed by the same mother of letters and stirred by the same restless spirit as that of the early Breton adventurers, Louis Hémon came three centuries later, carrying that light into the clearings amid the forests, whose solitudes he himself as a "hired man" with his axe helped to push further back toward the frozen North. The story of his prosaic days among those whose passion was to "make land" was transmuted by him in the intervals of his toil into an idyl of the Lake St. John country, named after its heroine, "Maria Chapdelaine"—a novel which, published posthumously, has become "one of the few great books of our day" and another exquisite though tragically brief chapter in the history of what was once Nouvelle France.

This scholar, son of a university professor, born in Brest, carried not only the light of France into the Upper Canadian clearings, but also its love for the simple folk who with primitive heroism still battle with the forest for enough soil to keep them alive and fit for further struggle. There are, in witness of this, to rise two monuments to the memory of this son of France who toiled in the wilderness of Upper Quebec: one in Canada and the other in Brittany, from whose coasts sailed Jacques Cartier, the first true son of France to enter the continent through the "mysterious gulf" of the St. Lawrence and to see the towering cliffs of the gloomy Saguenay close behind him. Whether up at Peribonka, where the winter terrors of the great forest had changed the living body of François Paradis, the trapper of Mistassini, Maria's lover, "into a thing of ice"; or near the lakes that have been rechristened Lake Hémon and Lake Chapdelaine; or at Quebec, the capital of the province, toward which he was traveling when death overtook him: whether at Brest or St. Malo or Dinant in Brittany; they are together to testify to something that is deeper than nationality even—to the consciousness of human kinship and common dependence upon a higher power.

The inscription which the Greek poet Theocritus composed for a statue to an ancient writer might well be placed upon the two monuments to Louis Hémon: "His myriad fame has passed westward alike and toward the dawning day." Myriad his fame has become, not because of many books, but because of one. His fame has traveled not only westward (passing him in his last slow journey) and eastward toward the dawning day, but southward toward the land to which Lorenzo, the other lover, sought to woo the daughter of the pitiless forest, the land where city people, as he said, would laugh to think of the homely ways and little shops of Roberval. It would do these selfsame city people good to contemplate the brave, god-fearing life of the simple folk whom Louis Hémon has pictured up in the land where Maria Chapdelaine is even now hoping that the fine weather will last in order that the "blue berries may be ripe for the feast of St. Anne." Dwellers on this side of the border, which needs no forts or fleets, might well join in building these twin monuments to the author of "Maria Chapdelaine."

The General Enemy.

Having failed utterly in the area of its present control, Bolshevism seeks aid from the outside, says David Jayne Hill in the North American Review. Having ruined Russia, it appeals to Europe. Having already exhausted the treasure extorted from its possessors by bloodshed and terror and harvested from the sacrament vessels of the church, this oligarchy of brigandage and assassination is now endeavoring at the same time to revolutionize the rest of the world through its propaganda and to wring from the civilization it would destroy, not only an admission of its legal authority, but the material means to carry on its procedure.

That Bolshevism entertains a desire to aid in the reconstruction of the Europe it has endeavored to destroy is incredible. Such a reconstruction is, on the contrary, an achievement it purposes to prevent by weakening Europe through division. For this purpose it is ready to enter into economic partnership with the rest of the world, or more precisely with portions of Western Europe, in order that by creating rivalries and jealousies it may the more effectively destroy it.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A man was sent to investigate a warm election contest in an outlying county of Arkansas. He returned to the legislature and reported that there were just two kinds of people in that county: one kind did not know and the other kind would not tell.

An old sailor who was under court-martial had been so impressed with the instructions of the young officer detailed for his defense that he determined to exercise the greatest care as to qualifying evidence. So when the judge-advocate asked him his name he answered, "Bill Taylor, or words to that effect."

A reunion of world war heroes occurred in a Western hotel recently. The head clerk, who was a first lieutenant, called the porter, who had been his captain, and the head waiter, who was his lieutenant-colonel, and they all joined forces democratically to throw out a former general who was using too much free space in the lobby.

Two darkies, Sambo and Rastus, were in a mutual competition to impress each other. Sambo flashed his new Ingersoll. "What time am it?" said Rastus. Sambo, whose uses for the timepiece were solely ornamental, gingerly extended it, saying, "Dar she am." Rastus looked at the face calculatingly and replied, "Dam if she ain't!"

Bad company is not always better than none. A canteen story dating back to the war concerns a certain damsel of high degree who never lost sight for a moment of the immense favor she was bestowing on her, for the most part, rough-neck patrons at the front. Her ideal, however, was to treat the doughboys as graciously as if they belonged to her own set. "And what will you have?" she inquired in her best pink-tea tone of a morose-looking youngster sitting alone at a table. "A ham sandwich and no conversation," replied the doughboy.

Bishop Candler of Atlanta, condemning a certain theological controversy, said he was reminded of the colored preacher who began a sermon, "Breddern and sistern, when de fust man, Adam, was created, he was made outer wet clay and set up 'gainst the palin's to dry." A dissenting member of the congregation arose and said, "Pawsin, if Adam was de first man, den who all made de palin's?" "Bre'er Simpkins, set down," said the parson disgustedly; "sech fool questions as yourn would upset any system of theology."

Persons who are bothered by bores in trains and on boats are recommended to try the following method of squelching unsought conversation. A student traveling in England and wishing to make up for lost time by reading was very much annoyed by the man opposite who insisted on keeping the conversation afloat. He was determined to exhaust every possibility offered by the weather. "The grass is very green, isn't it?" inquired the would-be conversationalist cheerfully. "Yes," said the student savagely; "such a change from the red and blue grass we've been having lately."

"Jack" Thorp, compiler of "Songs of the Cowboys," was driving some cattle from Old Mexico to Lamy, near Santa Fe. He had two hired men with him, but was accidentally minus his weapons. The three men met a company of about forty Villistas, under a ragged Mexican general, who accosted the Americans with the question, "Are you armed?" "Yes," said Thorp. "And are your men armed?" "They are." "And who gave you the right," demanded the general, "to carry arms in Mexico?" Thorp looked him coldly in the eyes and said: "The governor of the State of Texas." The general glared hungrily at the beef, and with a saddened air waved his permission to pass.

Mr. John Ayscough, who recently wrote a witty book on Cardinal Manning, has two stories on microbes. One was of the vicar's wife who insisted to the sextoness that the windows should be open, adding, "Or we shall have those horrid microbes." The sextoness, at a loss to understand the ecclesiastical lady's uncharitable frame of mind, said, "And aren't they communicants?" The other was of a certain great English lady who had just arrived from London at her country home in Scotland. She hastened to the gardens, where she encountered the gardener. "Donald," said she, "I hope you have kept well all winter." "Na sae weel, me leddy. Na that weel. Whiles I think we nane of us hae our healths the same sine the McCrawbies came in."

Arnold W. Brunner, the New York architect, who recently declined a $20,000 salary from the government of Pennsylvania on the grounds that he was already sufficiently well paid, says with reference to the people who can not understand his action: "Some people are puzzled by it. Well, such people, when it comes to government jobs, don't know the meaning of the word 'honesty.' Speaking etymologically, they are as much at sea as the club steward. An elderly gentleman, after a long sojourn in the Orient, said on his first visit to the club: 'Where's Abram, my old waiter? Not defunct, I hope?' 'That's what he's done, sir,' said the club steward furiously, 'with every blessed thing he could lay his hands on.'"

"I had almost forgotten Dr. Holmes, the dear little man," wrote Mr. Ernest W. Longtellow in his "Random Memories." "He was like a sparrow, always chirping so gayly. I remember one memorable lunch at Nahant when were present the doctor, Mr. Sumner, Professor Agassiz, Mr. Appleton, my father and myself. How gay the talk was and how brilliant! It would be hard to find four more wonderful talkers than the first four. I sat next to Dr. Holmes, and when he was not firing off volleys of firecrackers in response to the sallies of the others he was plying me with questions. I think it was Dr. Holmes who related that once in a small town he had struggled hard to get a laugh out of his audience. All his funniest sallies fell flat. Much discouraged, he finished the lecture and was about to depart when one of the selectmen came up and thanked him warmly for the lecture and remarked that 'some of the things you said were so funny that it was all we could do not to laugh.'"

(After the Conference)

Friendly Nippon, I salute you,
Brother of the Rising Sun,
Neighbor, clever and astute, you
Played a splendid game, and won.
You surmounted barriers mental
With a finesse Oriental
And a smile so brightly dental
That you made the business fun.

Some, I know, professed to doubt your Promises anent Shantung, Saying that, till you got out, your Words were but a bit of tongue.
Surely they are dull who see no
Humor in the things that we know,
While the fretful Filipino
Still complains of being stung.

Come! Let's can the tedious jingo
With this talk of future muss;
Though we speak a different lingo
Why should that stir up a fuss?
By your chivalrous emotion
You have bridged the western ocean.
My undiplomatic notion
Is that now it's up to us.

Millions in Salt

A description of the famous salt fields of Phokia, in Asia Minor, is contained in an article by Dorothy Kennard in the August Harper's Magazine. She writes:

"The salt country is unique: a flat and barren tableland, just high enough above sea-level to hide the sea at its horizon. One can study the pyramids of salt for nearly half an hour before one boards the little trolley car that runs one, along their base, to the front door of the manager's house. The cones are immense: they have an emplacement of some twenty or thirty meters square, each pyramid weighs four thousand tons, and is valued for sale at about twenty thousand sterling. We saw forty or fifty of such glistening sentinels, stretching, in ghostly formation, along the water's edge.

"Systematic drainage spreads a manœuvred sea into a series of squares, divided by breakwaters, over the tableland. And evaporation does the rest. The imprisoned ocean silts itself down, and is graduated, through the breakwaters, nearer and nearer to its final solidity. When formed, eventually, the crystal deposit is plowed, shoveled and deposited, as a substance, on a perfected railway arrangement of trolley cars, to the line of massed construction.

"Three hundred workmen, roughly, and an Italian manager, are responsible for a salt output that supplies one-half of Turkey."

Cocaine first obtained recognition as a valuable medicinal drug about thirty-five years ago, and the commercial supply was derived from leaves of the wild coca plant native to Peru. Now, however, the shrub is cultivated on an extensive scale in Java, which will export this year about 4,500,000 pounds of the leaves.

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Post-War Italy.

Modern Genoa (and the same holds good of Milan, and, to a less extent, of other commercial towns of Northern Italy) has a strong spiritual affinity with Manchester, says Herbert Sidebotham in the Atlantic Monthly. Manchester, with its doctrine of laissez faire, its free trade, and its conception of the world as an economic unity transcending nationalist divisions, arose out of the ashes of the Napoleonic wars; and many people have observed what a great impulse a rather tight-belted peace has given to these ideas in England. Back to Manchester (people are thinking but half-consciously), or England can not support her population.

So with Italy. If her industrial system is to flourish, she must depend on free interchange of commodities abroad. She is not a self-contained country, with a monopoly of certain luxuries, like France; and whereas post-war unemployment has hardly affected France, in Northern Italy, especially in the engineering and shipbuilding trades, it is most acute. The great engineering shops, which sprang up like mushrooms in the war and are now mouldering to decay, are, to adopt Lord Derby's celebrated phrase about unemployment in the north of England. Nor has she a great colonial empire, with protected markets. For these and other reasons, you find all over industrial Italy a keenness of perception of economic truths—and of that greatest of economic truths, that nations prosper by each other's prosperity—such as you find nowhere else in the world, except in Lancashire when times are bad. Moreover, there are few traces in Italy of bitter anti-German sentiment. She hardly thinks of herself as having been at war with Germany, but only with Austria; and Austria's humiliation is so complete that magnanimity costs her no great effort.

The Ultimate Debtor.

When M. Loucheur flatly says that France can not acquit her debt to America unless Germany acquits her debt to France, he is speaking the plain truth, says Sisley Huddleston in the Atlantic Monthly. Nor do I think that the United States can reasonably expect repayment unless all the allies and associates help her to obtain the wherewithal from the nation declared by everybody to be the ultimate debtor. But it is, in spite of anger, possible to ignore these external debts—which does not imply their repudiation. The connection between France's incomings and outgoings can not be denied. If that were all the problem, we could safely wait for the day when there would be agreement about the desirability of a clean international slate. Unfortunately, there is also the internal debt. That debt is piling up and up. It is not likely that Frenchmen will consent to a reduction of their claims on the government, to forego a good part of their savings lent on the strength of expectations on Germany, without putting up a most desperate fight. Surely, in spite of the gradual, and now almost complete, change of opinion in other countries, the maintenance of the old opinion in France can be readily understood. Every one hundred marks that Germany fails to pay comes off the bond-holding of an individual Frenchman.

At Del Monte.

Miss Helen Crocker and her brother, Mr. William Crocker, have been entertaining during the past fortnight at their villa, located in Del Monte forest, Mr. and Mrs. William Parrott, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence McCreery, and Mr. Richard de C. Schwerin.

A party of Burlingame people who motored to Del Monte Lodge last week-end was composed of Mr. and Mrs. Templeton Crocker, Mrs. Malcolm Whitman, and Mr. Baldwin Wood.

Among the guests at a dinner given at the Del Monte Lodge by Mr. and Mrs. David Blankenhorn of Pasadena were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel F. B. Morse of San Francisco.

Lord and Lady John Carberry are still at Del Monte and expect to extend their stay for another month. They were guests at a dinner given by Mr. Raymond Armsby, who also entertained Mr. and Mrs. Paul Iribe, Mrs. Alejandra McCondy Kaime, Mr. and Mrs. Francis McComas, Miss Ysabel Chase, and Mr. Eric Pedley.

Mrs. I. R. Viosca and her daughters, Isobel and Loreta Viosca, who recently returned from Europe, have made an extended stay at Del Monte. They plan taking an apartment in San Francisco.

THE GUITRYS IN LONDON.

The production of "Pasteur," which opened the Guitry season at the Princess Theatre in London, has been hailed by the British critics with more or less unanimous acclaim. The play was originally written for M. Lucien Guitry, father of the dramatist, Sacha Guitry, who is both actor and dramatist. It is natural that the great actor should find himself at home in a rôle created for him by his own son. The London Morning Post says:

"To the audience M. Guitry is Pasteur, the generous, lovable scientist, with all his genius, straightforward simplicity, and little human failings.

"The paradoxical description of Pasteur, 'l'homme le plus modeste du monde et le plus confiant en soi-même qu'on puisse rencontrer,' ceases to be a paradox when M. Guitry is the great scientist. The faith that moves mountains, the imagination without which the most painstaking observation and an infinite capacity for taking pains are mere ignes fatui, the all-embracing love of humanity which inspires the scientist's whole life, are felt instinctively, as Pasteur is shown in the most natural way in the world at five different moments of his life."

Not all the critics, to be sure, are quite so unqualified in their praise. Mr. Maurice Baring, writing in the New Statesman, complains that, although the creation of the stage character Pasteur to suit the talents of Guitry père may be a very fine thing from a purely histrionic viewpoint, it is a little hard on the great French biologist. Mr. Baring's criticism would carry more conviction with it, to be sure, were he not compelled to make the embarrassing confession that he has never read Valéry-Radot's "Life of Pasteur," on which the play is based. He writes:

"Not having read the 'Life of Pasteur,' I am unable to judge how far the play deviates from the facts, but every now and then a suspicion would creep into my mind that the truth was being modified or arranged to suit the part. I was told that this was so by some one who had read 'Pasteur's Life,' and that the crucial scene before the experiment was made on the child was in reality far more poignant and more intense, perhaps too intense, perhaps too naked for theatrical representation, or at any rate not quite in harmony with this particular play—involving perhaps the introduction of other elements, factors, and persons, which would have overloaded the framework as it was built.

"An exhibition of virtuosity is always a great treat, especially if the virtuoso has the talents and the art of M. Lucien Guitry. But one is glad on the whole that all plays are not of this kind—slices of reality arranged to suit a supreme virtuoso—and, wonderful as this display of discreet, subdued fireworks is, it is a display of fireworks; it is not the interpretation and the enlargement of a masterpiece."

Guitry fils is one of the most picturesque and interesting figures in contemporary French drama, so prolific a playwright that he almost recalls the English dramatists of Good Queen Bess' day—who at the very most never spent more than two or three weeks on their most ambitious plays.

Sacha Guitry grew up in the atmosphere of the theatre. As a boy he played in comedy, copying his father, and gradually he passed from playing comedies to writing them as naturally, according to the distinguished critic Nozière, "as an apple tree grows apples."

Japanese Architecture at Its Best.

Japanese temples, almost literally built over volcanoes, are a triumph of earthquake-proof construction in wood, writes Mary Titzel in Asia Magazine. They bear witness to long missionary journeys of Buddhist teachers. The Nikko shrines were erected in the seventeenth century, when Japanese art was in its most exuberant period. In the foreground stands the "torii," which has come to be almost symbolic of the Shintoism of Nippon. Though many explanations are given of the origin of the torii, scholars have traced a remarkable resemblance to the gateways or "torans" at Sanchi, the Buddhist temple in India, which were built in the first century A. D., about the time of the beginning of the first great missionary movement toward China. The famous Yomei Gate, seen through the torii, and the heavy-roofed shrines that surround it, are inheritances from China, either directly or through Korea. Japanese architecture from the first showed a more varied grace and a greater richness of detail than the Chinese models. By the time the Nikko temples were constructed, builders had departed far from the severe dignity of Cathay. The graceful roofs had been exaggerated and coarsened and burdened with huge ridges. The wonderful carving was almost too lavish. Delicacy had given way to a profusion and gorgeousness that foretold decadence.

Conditions in the United States point to political revolution, according to D. Chauncey Brewer in his new book, "The Peril of the Republic." If his theorizing is correct, this generation is in danger of a more serious crisis than that which stirred it during the world war.

Upper Silesia contains one-fourth of the coal supply of the former German Empire, and constituted before the war one of Germany's most flourishing industrial areas.

Norse Sailor's Joy.

Now, landmen, list! There is no sight more fair Than taut-strung cordage printed on pale air When noon is high and bravely the ship's course O'er-rides the riot of the restless horse That charge her bulwarks and go under, fleeing Far in foiled wrath. There is no fairer seeing Than tiny flags that flutter from the steep Slim mastheads as they dance above the deep, Crying aloud, "Good-by, good-by, you girls!" And from the ship's side the last eddy whirls Of land-locked water. There is nothing sweeter To seamen's eyes than sight of the Blue Peter Aloft and crying loudly to the land "We leave you, now we leave you!" Then each wand

Of corded wood becomes a violin The wind's hand dallies with as out and in His fingers wander, and the good ship goes With ranked sea-horses plunging at her bows, And in her sails the rumor of a drum Struck by the Monster she shall overcome! Yea, she shall overcome it and shall sing Through all her topsails in her triumphing When she rides down the level harbor ford Where lies one arm of ocean like a sword All steely cold, and o'er the sheer crag shooting. A sunbeam shows you all the gray gulls looting Nigh the lank nets that late have drawn the shoals.

Then all the sailors sing with gladdened souls To see the rockland after ocean-riding Through long, loud nights and still fair peace abiding That erst they knew ere that remembered day They left behind them their old Norröway; For in their nostrils are the sweet pine-smells, And in their ears the music of old bells, And in their eyes the promise of delight Round the warm angle at the fall of night. —Wilfrid Thorey in the English Review.

Sundown In America.

Into the torn sunset of Wyoming's desert past an Indian chief's grave Rides a consumptive cowboy whistling a jazz composed by a Galician Jew in Brooklyn; In a galvanized shack in the olive grove a rouge-lipped Italian girl Is noisily pulling the last sheet out of her type-writer; Two negroes are walking from the docks in Baltimore Talking about a meeting of the Knights of Pythias; On a farm in Kansas a small tow-headed boy baptized Johann Is peering from the threshold toward the telegraph poles for his daddy's Ford car; the calling of newsboys—the jangle and bellowing of the cows— The toot of endless horns—the rasping of crickets— The rush hour on the subways and trolleys—the piping of the sun-weary birds— The rise of the evening star above a forest on Lake Superior, Little merchants pompously switching on electric display lights, The clatter of dishes—the stamping of fly-ridden horses while unharassed; Young girls chattering hurriedly, powder their faces in dressing-rooms of department stores; On the darkened heights of Pike's Peak the mountain flowers huddle to sleep before the cold; On a straggling fishing boat off Nantucket A man is looking at the comics of last Sunday's Boston newspaper; On the outskirts of Mt. Rainier a man lying in an underbrush, Is breaking the law aiming his gun at a solitary antler; On a porch of a boarding-house of Santa Barbara a bobbed-haired, middle-aged novelist Is reading a love letter from a college boy and smoking a cigarette; A toy train full of Hungarian miners is puffing into a filthy company-owned town; In a store of Omaha a hesitating Bohemian farmer is examining a phonograph; On a lonely sandbar of the Atlantic a flock of snipes is dashing through the shallows— It is sundown in America. —Charles Recht in the Liberator.

The Electorate.

Men are not created equal. A very large part of our population, almost fourteen millions, are of alien birth, with little experience in self-government and often no aptitude for it, says John Corbin in the North American Review. The army mental tests, though made in haste under unfavorable conditions and admittedly subject to revision, show beyond question that the average of our citizens is alarmingly low.

Almost a quarter of the draft men (24.9 per cent.) were, by any genuine test, illiterate—and, at least by inference, twenty-five millions of the American people. Over 47 per cent. were technically morons, with a "mental age" under twelve years. "The only remedy for democracy," say the socialists, "is more democracy and always more and more democracy." In plain terms, if a citizenship of literates fails, add the illiterates; if that fails, add the morons, the imbeciles, the idiots.

Dinner Guests at Hotel Rafael

You wouldn't dream of leaving large sums of money in your home or office day after day and night after night.

Yet you leave valuable treasures there—heirlooms, jewelry, keepsakes—which money could never replace; you leave important papers there—insurance policies, securities, receipts—the loss of which would cost you large sums of money.

Did it ever occur to you that there is absolutely no safety for your valuables in your home or office?

You do not need to be reminded of fire dangers and the uncertainty and havoc of them, but you may not realize what an intricate, scientific, almost infallible profession burglary is! Home and office locks and safes are slight obstacles in the way of a professional thief.

Your turn may not have come yet, but that does not mean that it never will.

But it never will if you take the proper precautions. Don't trust the home hiding places—a joke to thieves.

THE CROCKER SAFE DEPOSIT VAULTS have been built to defeat the professional burglar and safecracker, and to safeguard against earthquake and fire.

The boxes are large and conveniently arranged, and the key on your chain is the only one that unlocks your box. You are assured of absolute privacy, and, for about one cent a day, you are assured also of perfect protection.

When you are in this vicinity again, give us the pleasure of showing you through these splendid vaults.

"I see befo' me," said the colored preacher on Easter Sunday, "twelve chicken stealers, includin' Kentucky Joe." After the morning service Joe made it clear to the parson that that slanderous statement must be withdrawn if the preacher's nose was to remain intact. In the four cases of international friction which the League [of Nations] has reconciled during its first two years, one point stands clearly disclosed: the sole authority of the league is moral force; it rests on consent, and not on coercion, says Raymond B. Fosdick in the Atlantic Monthly. It can suggest, but can not necessarily impose a settlement. Its victories are gained, not by arms, but by concentration of world public opinion. If in the future it helps to maintain peace, it will be, not because it represents an overwhelming combination of military force, but because by slow stages it succeeds in gathering up the moral judgments of mankind into one powerful shaft of light and bringing that light to bear on instances of international justice.

Johnson and Moore.

In these final days of the primary campaign Senator Johnson, so his friends assert, is "working himself up into form." Mr. Hearst's Examiner applauds the fact that Mr. Johnson's trip through the Valley has put him in "fighting trim"; and we further have it on the testimony of the Chronicle that he proposes at his forthcoming meeting in the Exposition Auditorium to "strike with both fists." Mr. Hearst's Call chimes in that it will surely be an interesting meeting, since Mr. Johnson proposes to "flay his critics."

So we are going to have our amiable senator in the fine flower of his favorite mood. He is going to respond to the wishes of his more ardent clackers by having an attack of fits. This is his specialty. Like the quack of the familiar legend, he is "hell on fits." It will be a spectacular and striking exhibition. But it would be more to the point if, instead of working himself into a wild rage, Mr. Johnson were to answer certain legitimate queries which have been propounded to him and to which he has as yet in this campaign failed to give attention.

The people of California would like to know the basis of Mr. Johnson's affiliation with Mr. Hearst—why it is that Mr. Hearst has paid him a heavy fee for a nominal and futile service, and why there was secured for Mr. Johnson a fee from Hearst's friends in the Tammany administration of New York for another futile service. They would like to know by what means Johnson won the support of Hearst's newspapers. They would like to know the bottom reason why, in coöperation with Hearst, Johnson abandoned the party to which he is accredited and the Administration to whose support he is pledged, to vote against the pact which guarantees peace in the Pacific Ocean. They would like to know why Johnson dodged the vote on the Esch-Cummins bill, and why he was "detained by a storm," when there was no storm, from voting in the Newberry contest. They would like to know why, when he pretends to be a Republican, and now claims support as a Republican, he allies himself with Senator La Follette and other enemies of his party and of the President, and makes of himself a blooming nuisance at Washington. If Johnson would answer these and other pertinent questions that have been presented to him he would do far more for himself in this campaign than by flying into rages, fighting with both fists, flaying his critics, and generally acting the part of a hot-headed and angry boy.

California is a Republican state. The Republicans of California are solicitous in support of the Administration at Washington. They are profoundly friendly to President Harding and they want their representatives to coöperate with Mr. Harding in the measures he is urging upon Congress. It is no answer to these demands that Mr. Johnson voted to raise the tariff on almonds.

This is not a time when the Republicans of California want to send to the Senate a "free lance," a man who is a Republican only when it comes to elections, who at other times stands in affiliation with William Randolph Hearst and the senatorial group of which Senator La Follette is the leading spirit. It is for these reasons that Mr. Moore is finding wide support, very notably among former partisans of Mr. Johnson. A vote for Moore is a vote against the whimsies, the vagaries, the alliances associated with the name of Senator Johnson. A vote for Moore is a vote for a man of character, a man who, if elected as a Republican, will represent the party, be faithful to its principles and loyal to its leadership.

Upon Information and Belief.

Responding to many inquiries, we herewith present the ticket that the Argonaut will vote in next Tuesday's primary election:

- For United States Senator—Charles C. Moore.
- For Chief Justice, Supreme Court—Curtis D. Wilbur.
- For Associate Justice, Supreme Court (full term)—Charles A. Shurtleff and William A. Sloane; (short term) William H. Waste.
- For Presiding Judge, District Court of Appeal—John F. Tyler.
- For Representative in Congress, Fourth District—Julius Kahn.
- For Judge of the Superior Court (full term)—Lester G. Burnett, George H. Cabaniss, James Morris Troutt, and Louis H. Ward; (for short term) Walter Perry Johnson.
- For Governor—Friend William Richardson.
- For Lieutenant-Governor—Joseph A. Rominger.
- For Secretary of State—Frank C. Jordan.
- For Comptroller—Roy L. Riley.
- For State Treasurer—Charles G. Johnson.
- For Surveyor-General—W. S. Kingsbury.
- For State Senator, Twentieth District—Elmer E. Robinson.
- For Member of Assembly, Twenty-Seventh District—William Seward Scott.
- For Member County Central Committee, Twenty-Seventh District—Arthur C. Campbell, Lee Richardson Jacobson, George W. Kemper, Peter J. Owen, and William S. Scott.
- For Justice of the Peace—Frank W. Dunn, Byron

C. Parker, Thomas F. Prendergast, Rolla Bishop Watt, and Richard Abel.

This ticket is made up after careful inquiry as to the relative merits of the several candidates, and with consideration, in the case of judicial aspirants, of the legitimate claims of incumbency.

About Newspapers.

Reference to the career of the late Lord Northcliffe may serve to illustrate differences between British and American newspaper practice. In the British Isles there is, or has been until very recently, but one centre of political interests. One body, the British Parliament, serves all in legislative matters both great and small. It is to the newspapers published at the seat of government—London—that the Englishman, the Scotchman, or the Irishman turns for political discussion, which, when all is said and done, is the backbone of the news. Likewise, London is the centre of social, commercial, and other general interests. Whoever anywhere in England, Scotland, or Ireland keeps in touch with what goes on in London, or with what is directly mirrored there, is, from the British standpoint, fully equipped at the point of current intelligence. His convenience, and the publisher's as well, is served by the fact that in the remotest districts he may read by his evening fireside papers still damp from the London presses. London newspapers—those of the traditional sort—are addressed, not to the local community, but to the whole realm; and naturally they deal more with national than with local interests. Thus Britain has an essentially national journalism. It is a journalism proceeding from the one great centre of political, social, and commercial interests and addressed to the property and governing class. It is only in relatively recent times—since the establishment of the Mail by Northcliffe (then Alfred Harmsworth) in 1896—that the newspaper press of Britain has made more than casual appeal to the non-cultivated masses. From time immemorial until this relatively recent period the reading of newspapers has been limited to the super-intelligent few, and to this class, of course, the newspapers were addressed in spirit, in matter, in form.

How much of the change illustrated in the success of the Mail stands related to Northcliffe and his innovations, and how much stands related to the pressure of newer times, it is impossible to say. However this may be, the Mail, which from its beginning made appeal to the masses, has been and remains both a popular and a financial success. It has carried the news, albeit in sensational form, and much of it relative to trivial things, to millions who previously never by any chance looked into a newspaper. It has developed an interest in events with study of their political meaning, plus a sense of political power, previously non-existent. If it has not in terms revolutionized the British government it has brought about or has been coincidental with changes that have broken the old-time monopoly of privilege and property in the business of government. Men of conservative mind bewail the change and have assailed Northcliffe as a breaker-down of the best traditions of British life. Accepting the challenge, he always maintained that the old traditions of British life needed breaking down in the interest of social justice and that whatever he had done to that end was a contribution to the moral welfare of the nation.

Today the two fashions in journalism exist side by side. The old-established newspapers—the Times, the Telegraph, and the Morning Post—holding to aristocratic standards, make the traditional appeal to the educated and the property classes and maintain the old elegance in form and manner. Concurrently, the newer papers, more or less modeled after the Mail, are wrought in lighter mood and deal with lighter themes. The financial advantage is distinctly with the popular papers. They circulate more widely and their profits are vastly greater. Of the older papers, only the Telegraph is even fairly prosperous, while the papers of the newer sort pile up large profits for their owners. What the change betokens for British life we will not undertake to define further than to say that it implies a vastly wider basis for political policies. In government it makes the differences illustrated in comparison of Lloyd George and Mr. Gladstone. In current politics it implies increased authority of popular as compared with aristocratic motives. What these changes may signify relative to the ultimate life and character of Britain we will not venture even to guess.

The character of a newspaper, however it may otherwise be inspired, is largely defined—or created—by its advertising patronage. It is from advertising that newspapers draw their main support. And here is a significant fact in relation to the British newspapers. The more generous life of Britain is largely in the country. And people living remote from towns have not easy access to general marts. They resort largely to the "mail order" system, and are habitual buyers of the kind of merchandise that enters into luxurious living. Dealers in such merchandise find in the newspapers a ready means of reaching their customers. Thus newspaper advertising in England has been representative of vastly costlier kinds and types of merchandise than with us. It has, therefore, been to the interest of the publisher to circulate his paper among the prosperous, and to this end he has addressed his columns largely to the "classes" rather than to the multitude which, until very recent times, has not been a liberal buyer of things advertised. With other changes there has now come a condition which makes it profitable in England as with us to advertise for the trade of the many as distinct from the few, and this change has contributed greatly to the prosperity of the newer fashion in journalism. Comparison of the advertising columns of the Times or the Post with the Mail will illustrate the differences here suggested. What may be styled class merchandise, designed for the luxurious country-house market, is still exploited in the old and standard journals. Invitations to the cheaper marts, to bargain-counter sales and the like, are spread broadcast in the more popular papers. All this is having its effect upon British journalism. Less and less even the great journals are catering to exclusive business. More and more they are seeking patronage of the popular stores—and of "popular" readers. The tendency is towards popularization even on the part of the conservative newspapers.

Under the conditions of our own country a national journalism comparable with the national journalism of Britain is out of all question. We have, not one centre of political interests, but, with the national capital and our various states' capitals, a total of forty-nine. It is not practicable for a newspaper publisher anywhere in this country to epitomize the national political life after the fashion of a paper published in London. Then the size of the United States, physically speaking, makes national circulation of any one paper impracticable. A paper published at Washington or New York can not be delivered and read in San Francisco short of five days and more. Frequently six or seven days are required for transit and delivery. Even if it were possible for an American newspaper to cover completely the political and commercial interests of the country, its contents would be outdated and obsolete by the time they were in the hands of more than a fraction of our people. Furthermore, we have not here the homogeneity essential to support of a nationalized newspaper. Under all these conditions it is inevitable that our newspapers should mainly be local in character. Their centres of gravity rest each in its own field; and this means the exploitation of community as distinct from national interests. There are eight columns to the page in the average American newspaper. In the San Francisco daily papers of the date of this writing six of their eight first-page columns deal with affairs of merely community interest and only two with affairs of national interest. In brief, our American journalism, limiting that phrase to the daily newspaper press, is essentially and necessarily local.

It is a common allegation that our newspapers are controlled by their advertisers, and there is much in their policies and make-up that looks like confirmation of this indictment. But the truth is that the advertisers do not so much control the policy of the newspapers as that the newspapers control the policy of the advertisers. The publisher, say of the San Francisco Examiner or the Chronicle, is less a journalist in the professional sense than a dealer in advertising space. He seeks to make his columns valuable to the man who has goods to sell. Now the prosperous and well-to-do classes in America are not habitual buyers of the sorts of merchandise exploited in the daily newspapers. Mrs. Vere de Vere (we trust nobody will think that we use this name ironically), who lives in a fashionable avenue, avoids a bargain sale as she would a pestilence. Mr. Vere de Vere gets his clothes from his tailor, who does not advertise. If a member of the Vere de Vere family is sick a physician is called in and his prescription is sent to the druggist. The Vere de Veres contribute to the Examiner or to the Chronicle only the dollar per month that is paid for delivery of the paper at the front door. Now how is it as to the O'Flahertys, who live at the Potrero, or the Bacigalupis, who live on Telegraph Hill? O'Flaherty père or Bacigalupi père brings home Saturday night say twenty dollars in cash, the result of his week's labors. This sum is divided pretty speedily between the dealers of ready-made clothing, the bargain counter, and the patent medicine shop. Therefore the O'Flahertys and the Bacigalupis are infinitely more valuable to the publisher of the Examiner or the Chronicle than the Vere de Veres. It becomes a point of policy with the publishers to put into their papers the things that will interest the O'Flahertys and the Bacigalupis. If the papers print elaborate accounts of the doings of the Vere de Veres and the social group to which they are attached, with pictures illustrating their movements, etc., it is designed for the entertainment of the O'Flahertys and the Bacigalupis, who are always intensely interested in the doings of the socially higher-ups. If five pages are given to the details of a murder, it is intended by the publisher as an appeal to the classes whose reading habits are practically limited to sensational news and whose appetite for it is always avid. In brief, the effort of the publisher is to season his paper to the taste of the "masses" because they are habitual buyers of advertised merchandise. Here is the whole secret of the sensational press. It has discovered that the way to make a newspaper prosperous is to make it attractive to the class that buys ready-made clothing, that is interested in bargain sales, and that consumes patent dopes.

In newspapers as in other things habit counts heavily. For many years San Francisco has been served by a sensational press practically to the exclusion of any other kind of daily press. Thus even the classes—the Vere de Veres and their kind—presumably conservative in general matters are addicted to the yellow newspaper habit. Unless the average San Franciscan finds in his morning paper anywhere from one to half a dozen highly-spiced "stories" he—more particularly she—has no sense of having read the news. It is not enough to tell of decent happenings in decent style. There must be the interest that attaches to scandalous doings or the paper is held to be flat. This defines the problem, or one phase of it, of whoever may seek to establish here a rational and conservative newspaper. The habit of the community has become fixed and it finds little satisfaction or none at all in a journal dealing with sober and serious things. The average San Francisco newspaper reader wants to know all about the Wilkens case, the latest intrigue in "high life." He seeks further entertainment in the vulgarities of the Jiggs family or in the adventures of the Gumps. He revels in bathing-girl portraiture. For those who care for serious interests, for authentic information, for intelligent discussion and for clean humor, there is of course the Argonaut. Let us whisper low, the unique prestige of the Argonaut, with its long-maintained vogue, is due to the fact that it finds no rivalry in our daily newspaper press.

Our Regulatory Laws Need "Teeth."

President Harding's failure to put an end to the railroad strike has exhibited to the country the deficiencies of our regulatory system, with the need for more effective laws relating to industries founded in public necessity. Transportation is foremost among our essential utilities and ways and means must be found to adjust controversies relative to it without paralyzing the activities of the whole country. The President made this point plain in his address to Congress on Friday last. We quote:

The law creating the Railroad Labor Board is inadequate. * * * It has little or no power to enforce its decisions. It can impose no penalties on either party disregarding its decisions. It can not halt a strike and, manifestly, it deliberately omitted the enactment of compulsory arbitration. The decisions of the board must be made enforceable and effective against carriers and employees alike.

Further, with reference to immediate conditions, the President says:

I must impress Congress and the country that no body of men, whether limited in numbers and responsible for railway management, or powerful in numbers and consisting of the necessary forces in railroad operation, shall be permitted to choose a course which imperils public welfare. Neither organizations of employers nor workmen's unions may escape responsibility. When related to a public service, the mere fact of organization magnifies that responsibility and public interest transcends that of either grouped capital or organized labor.

In these remarks the President puts up to Congress an imperative duty. Even more important and more timely is Mr. Harding's concurrent declaration of the policy of the Administration with respect to the immediate strike situation. Upon this point he says:

The first obligation and the first allegiance of every citizen, high or low, is to his government. * * * No matter what hardships may attend or what sacrifices may be necessary, government by law must and will be sustained. Wherefore, I am resolved to use all the power of the government to maintain transportation and sustain the right of men to work.

The President is not responsible for the defects in our system of regulatory laws. Since there is no law by which he may bring the strike to an end and since his persuasions have failed, there is nothing left for him to do but to stand firm in support of fundamental rights. This plainly he intends to do. He will "sustain the right of men to work."

Mr. Samuel Gompers, speaking in the name of the American Federation of Labor, characterizes President Harding's declaration in his address to Congress last week as "unfortunate." Unfortunate why? Will Mr. Gompers dare maintain that American citizens are not entitled to protection of their government in "the right to work"?

Johnson as a Senator.

A group of citizens of Santa Barbara, represented by an executive committee including Henry S. Pritchett, Francis T. Underhill, Samuel P. Calef, Edward B. Starbuck, and Edward S. Spaulding, are issuing a campaign paper under the name Santa Barbara Republican. From the issue of the Republican of August 15th we excerpt the following:

It is a pitiful thing to see a candidate for the Senate of the United States motoring from one community to another, claiming reelection on the ground that he has secured certain tariffs favorable to a few products in his state. If such tariffs are justified, it is the plain duty of any senator to work for their adoption. If they are not justified it would be equally his duty to stand like a man against them. But to claim reelection as a senator of the United States on the paltry ground that he had raised the duty on almonds is the most cowardly exhibition that could possibly be made by a candidate for the great office of United States senator. Have there been no questions in the Senate during the six years of Senator Johnson's service, larger, more important, more far-reaching, than the question of a duty on almonds? The consideration of that industry is part of the everyday work. It goes without saying that any competent senator would have sought to do the just thing by his state, but to claim that as a reason and almost the main reason for election to the great office of a senator in the national Congress is the most pitiful claim ever put forward by a senator of the United States for reelection.

Mr. Johnson entered the Senate the best advertised man who had come to that distinguished body in twenty-five years. He was known as a popular governor of his state. He had been a candidate for the vice-presidency and so had met audiences throughout the country who had listened with interest to his oratorical exhibitions. He was looked upon as a man who would grow to be a power in the Senate.

These expectations have remained absolutely unfulfilled.

It would be hard to select a man more ill-suited for the work of a senator than Hiram Johnson. His great rôle is that of a stump speaker, and he has continued to be a stump speaker in the Senate. That sort of high talk gains little in the Senate of the United States. The impassioned speeches which Senator Johnson sends out to his constituents are made to empty benches. Now and then in a particular discussion the opportunity arises when a debater may make for himself a name on the floor of the Senate, but even in this respect Senator Johnson has been a failure. He has come to be classed, in the minds of the more influential men of the Senate and of the government, with a small group of senators who are known as the "Talkers Club"—Johnson, La Follette, Borah, and Norris, who call themselves Republicans, and Jim Reed and Tom Watson, who call themselves Democrats. This group of men is always talking over the heads of the Senate to an imaginary public beyond. Their words are bitter, they have little effect except to stir up anger and resentment.

Senator Johnson's prestige has never been so high in the Senate as it was the day he entered it. The work of the Senate is not done by the men who make long and impassioned appeals. It is done by the able and thoughtful men who both in the public business of the Senate and in the committee work in which the real questions are thrashed out give themselves steadily, seriously, day by day, to the hard work of thinking out and solving public questions. For this kind of work Senator Johnson has little ability and less inclination. He gradually allied himself with a group of bitter critics of the Administration. He has opposed the most important and best-considered measures which the head of his party, the President of the United States, has proposed. He is in no position today to render to California a great service in the Senate nor to render the Senate a great service in the country.

He is another illustration of the fact that the glib talker on the stump oftentimes lacks both the capacity for work and the ability for clear and impartial thinking which are necessary for high service in the Senate.

There is still another reason why Senator Johnson has failed to get the respect and confidence of his colleagues. Ever since he has been in the Senate he has had his eye on the presidency of the United States, and his colleagues have felt, and rightly felt, that such legislation as he favored was aimed to advance his personal candidacy rather than to serve the essential interests of the whole country and of the whole public. It is a sound tradition in the Senate of the United States with all its weaknesses that the man who is confessedly a candidate for the presidency is not whole-heartedly a senator. Mr. Johnson falls in the estimate of his fellow-senators in this category.

Finally, Mr. Johnson is not a Republican. He has never attended the party caucuses. He has never lent himself to the process of working out a consistent party policy. He holds himself above his party and is coming to hold himself above his state. He is a Johnsonite, first, last, and always, and other considerations for the good of the state he represents, of the Senate of which he is a member, or of the country of which he is a citizen take second place.

As a stump speaker in California or in the Senate, Mr. Johnson is a glittering success. As a senator, he has been a dead failure.

Crime.

Like the man that always made it a point to speak well of the Deity, the members of the American Bar Association who assembled in San Francisco a week or so ago expressed their disapproval of crime. They can not endorse it, and would be glad to see it diminished, and even entertained plans and proposals looking to that end. It is a good idea. But one of the plans proposed does not seem, to a mere lay mind, logically adapted to the object in view. It was to suppress the manufacture and possession of pistols, because most crimes of violence were found to have been committed with those violent little instruments.

Somehow it reminds one of Mark Twain's dread of beds. He found that most people die in bed, and therefore it was natural to suppose that there was something fatal about occupying one. All the statistics supported that conclusion, and if truth can not be reached by statistics, how is it to be discovered? The line of reasoning was complete. The only imperfection of it was its lack of any nexus of cause and effect. And the legal gentlemen who regard pistols as the cause of crime are falling into somewhat similar confusion. It may be that when men went armed they shot quicker. But that is not the sort of crime society has to fight nowadays. Furthermore, that mode of dress has passed out of fashion, except in the motion pictures and in a few remote parts of the cattle country. Old San Franciscans can remember when carrying navy revolvers was quite common. As order and security came, the hardware was found heavy, and was left at home. Today the carrying of revolvers by honest men is rare; by thugs, quite general. And it will not be greatly reduced on the part of the thugs through prohibiting the manufacture of sidearms. Nor can crime be much diminished in that way. Crooks that want pistols will find ways to get them; the persons who can not get them will be those that may have some honest need for them as household protection. And if thugs can not get pistols, there are other weapons. It is not the weapon that is the criminal. It is the savage, unregenerate, primitive human, whose disposition is selfish and whose character is undisciplined to social requirements. We believe he is usually the product of bad parenthood, expressing itself in indulgence and feeble control. Villainy is a quite natural thing, and the curbing of it in oneself or in another is an art. It is not to be accomplished by easy methods and sobbing sympathy for the criminal as the victim of society. Criminals are not the victims of society, society is the victim of criminals, and of the worthless parenthood that brings them up.

It sometimes happens that the son of quite decent parents goes wrong and disgraces them. In such cases they suffer bitterly for any faults of omission or commission of which they may have been guilty. But more often parents of criminals have neglected their duty toward society and toward their erring children, and they should be punished with them. Parental responsibility is a moral reality and it ought to be a legal one. When corporal punishment is needed, and parents have not inflicted it with earnestness and vigor, they have made themselves particeps criminis in the delinquency of the erring youth. There are times in the life of almost every healthy boy when showing him his meanness and demanding that he mend his ways does no earthly good, and then there is no substitute for a good whaling. Blaming crime on weapons is like blaming death on beds.

Aiding and abetting the incompetent parent is the political judge, the sort of man that fears to lose his salary and has found that under a condition of universal suffrage and an elective judiciary he can count on votes at the next election in exact proportion to the leniency he shows to crooks. Such men as that, confirming the work of the criminal parent, are almost enough to account for the fact that we had in this country last year 9500 murders, and in the past decade 85,000; with an increase of 1200 per cent. in burglaries last year. Almost, but not quite. There is another element contributing, and that is the relaxation of punishment in response to the demands of sentimental reformers, persons more horror-stricken at one hanging than at five unpunished murders. The abolition of capital punishment in some dozen or so of states has not diminished murders in those states, or at least so it was asserted at one session of the Bar Association. And no normal person should have supposed that it would. Crime is the choice and responsibility of the individual criminal, and to make him choose something else it is necessary to equip him with the fear of punishment, swift, certain, and severe. Society can not afford to gamble the lives of its innocent members against the disposition of its guilty ones; the stake is not merely disproportionate in comparison with any return that might accrue in the shape of a criminal reclaimed by gentle methods, but it is immoral to expose the innocent to the depredations of the criminally disposed for any such visionary object. The sentimentalists that got up the parole system and the probation law are, we believe, morally responsible for a great deal of the criminality that has manifested itself of late. They have meant well, Heaven knows, but they have not done well. And if they can point to a few reclaimed criminals, the number reclaimed is no justification for permitting the recidivists to prey on the innocent.

So we have enough causes for the prevalence of crime besides pistols. To stop the manufacture of pistols and permit the manufacture of criminals to go on, and to suppose that because we have done that we have supplied some solution for the trouble, is hardly rational. Bad mothers and fathers, venal judges, punishments made mild by misplaced mercy, and the expectation set up in the mind of the underworld of dodging even those punishments through the operation of the parole and probation laws, are far more potent producers of crime than all the arms factories of New England. We should stop paltering with crime, treat it as a personal matter, and attack it by attacking the criminal with all the strength of criminal justice untampered by visions and sentimentality.

Editorial Notes.

It is hardly necessary to remind intelligent citizens of California that as between candidates for the Supreme Bench (Judge Wilbur and Judge Lawlor) the former is in every way to be preferred. Judge Wilbur is in the prime of life, a lawyer of eminent standing, a judge of experience. He will bring to the State Supreme Bench public confidence, leadership, and dignity of the highest order.

The season of stress that the country has suffered since April in connection with the coal mining industry gives emphasis to the President's demand for investigation looking to some system of governmental regulation. It has become evident that an industry so vital in the life of the country can not with safety be left subject to paralyzing contentions between owners and workers.

The government must in justice and safety to the public apply a directing hand to the coal industry. Ways and means of doing this can only be defined upon the basis of information not now available, and it is to the end of getting at the facts and of defining methods of regulation that President Harding's demand for a commission is made.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"Appreciated and Passed On."

SAMUEL DAVIS

Attorney and Counsellor at Law

Boston, August 8, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Enclosed find check to continue my subscription. I enjoy your paper greatly, especially the trenchant and able editorials. Your recent attention to Senator Johnson and his fee from Mayor Hyland is much appreciated. My copy of your fine paper is passed on to several others after my reading.

A Bouquet From Portland.

PORTLAND, OREGON, August 19, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I enclose draft in renewal of my subscription. I often wish that I might positively disagree with your admirable editorials. I think it would stimulate my sense of self-respect. But alas, and alas; the weeks go by and I find my own ideas uncannily reproduced, and clothed, too, with a pungent cogency which I could not even hope to approach. And so I find myself eagerly looking forward to the Saturday mail to learn what I have been thinking of during the week. Keep it up, please, keep it up. And here's health and a long life to you, and more power to your good right arm.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

(Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

Western Canada is suffering for want of trade with the United States and—against the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec—urges reciprocity with the big country beyond the line. The farmers want to send their wheat and the ranchmen their cattle over the short haul and get our machinery in return. They want their grass-fed cattle "finished" in our corn belt.

Canada could have had reciprocity under Mr. Taft's proposals in 1911 and at any time for a decade thereafter, and refused it. Now Mackenzie King is prime minister of a changed administration, and he wants us to know that Canada as a whole is eager to reach an understanding.

Those who at Ottawa are saying, "No trucking with the Yankees," do not deserve to have their way. Those who declare reciprocity an opening wedge toward annexation talk ridiculously. The United States does not want Canada any more than she wants Mexico. She has on hand the big business of managing herself, and there are problems enough within her own majestic confines.

But on our side of the border some who oppose reciprocity are putting a pen-point worse than a knife-edge to immensely lucrative possibilities. Note how the present emergency tariff is killing, not merely Canada's exports to us, but our exports to Canada. In the fiscal year that ended in June their exports to us dropped from $501,933,266 to $295,398,203; our exports to them dropped from $766,393,077 to $501,540,869. In the year Great Britain has taken our place as Canada's best customer, the British purchases totaling $301,838,559.

The prime minister says the government is ready at any time to consider overtures from Washington to mend the depressing condition. Every argument, not alone of intentional amity, but of self-interest, urges action at Washington as at Ottawa to overcome the economic impasse by which both countries are losing so heavily.

IRELAND'S LOSS.

(Washington Post.)

The death of Arthur Griffith has occurred at an inopportune time for the land he so well loved and so loyally served. In its formative period the new Irish Free State will have need of men of the Griffith stamp—men of vision, of keen intelligence and logical mind, of courage blended with moderation, of idealism tempered by practical considerations, and of determination to stick to a policy which they know to be right, whether or not it secures immediate popular approval.

In the now far-off days when Griffith began publicly to inculcate those principles and to advocate that line of action which later came to be classed under the generic title of Sinn Fein he stood practically single-handed and alone against conditions to which long usage and success in certain lines had seemingly guaranteed a perennial continuance. He had, on the one hand, to fight British domination in Ireland, but, stupendous as were the odds, that was the hardest part of his task, because on such a question he had with him the overwhelming majority of his fellow-countrymen. On the other hand, however, he had also to fight the Irish constitutional party, which had been fused into a mighty political machine by the genius of Parnell, and even after Parnell had gone down in death following disaster enjoyed the prestige of having wrested from a reluctant alien Parliament, not only an acknowledgment of the principle of home rule, but also very material benefits in the shape of land legislation and organized efforts toward the development of national resources.

For long and weary years Griffith was but a voice crying in the wilderness against the supineness and paralysis which in later days had overtaken that once formidable political combination, and but for the cataclysmic upheaval and the realignment of forces caused by the rebellion of 1916 he might still have been pleading in vain. That outstanding event, however, set the seal of promise, if not of performance, on the Sinn Fein methods, and although Griffith took no part in the rising and was even opposed to it, it had the strange effect of bringing him and his policies into the commanding position which they have ever since maintained.

Griffith was never a republican nor, in the full and true sense of that term, a separatist. He rather envisaged something like a return to the constitutional status that prevailed in Ireland under Grattan's parliament, but with the removal of the limitations and curbs which hampered that legislative body and eventually proved its undoing. That was what he had in mind when in December, 1921, he signed the Hiberno-English treaty which established the principle and set up the machinery of the Irish Free State. That he judged aright the temper and aspirations of Irishmen the march of events has since abundantly demonstrated. It is a pity that the guiding hand of the master should so soon be removed from the helm of the ship of state, but he had clearly charted and marked out the course to be followed by his successor in steering it to the haven of peace and prosperity.

100 PER CENT. AMERICAN. (New York Times.)

The Committee on International Law of the American Bar Association, which met last week in San Francisco, in commending the International Court of Justice at The Hague, said of it:

"The court is due to American initiative, American persistence, American ingenuity. And in this court sits an American."

More specifically, Mr. Root, whom Lord Shaw referred to as "the Grotius of America," and Mr. Choate, both past Presidents of this national organization and of the legal ability of America, are by name associated in the report with the origins of this court in which an eminent American jurist is now sitting. American initiative, persistence, and ingenuity exercised through such craftsmanship as that of these great national and international statesmen (not to mention others, who are also not mentioned in the report), certainly warrant putting the hall-mark of presumed political perfection ("100 per cent. American") upon the fabric of our best minds. Is this international institution of American origin and ingenious construction not to be thought perfect apart from the present administration?

The more than forty nations that have accepted and adopted the court seem disposed to let us improve that to which we make such proud claim so that we may ourselves join them in its use. The Committee on International Law of the American Bar Association has been instructed under a motion made by Chief Justice Taft "to suggest changes in the statutes organizing the International Court at The Hague which might make it possible for the United States to participate." That committee should also have prompt instruction from the country at large in support of what the Chief Justice has proposed. Not only does the court need our moral support, but we are shamed in the eyes of the world till we ourselves accredit that whose existence we attribute to American initiative, persistence, and ingenuity.

LINCOLN AND FORD. (Washington Star.)

The Ford boomers are finding in the boomie a likeness to Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln had a kind heart. So has Mr. Ford. Mr. Lincoln was eminently practical. So is Mr. Ford. Mr. Lincoln was a good judge of men. So is Mr. Ford. Mr. Lincoln was dependable. So is Mr. Ford. And so on. Hence, the thing to do is to put Mr. Ford in the White House, and in that exalted place give him opportunity to exercise the qualities which as exercised by Mr. Lincoln in the same place proved of such valuable importance to the country.

Great! Mr. Lincoln possessed many high qualities in rare combination. He was kind of heart, clear of head, firm of purpose, and abundantly supplied with staying power. In a time of appalling disturbance he rendered the country service beyond price.

But "we shall not look upon his like again." As appraised today by thoughtful men of his own and other countries, Mr. Lincoln was born for the emergency he met. How he would meet the present emergency is but speculation, and, wide and inviting as the field is, such speculation is not the need of the hour.

Mr. Ford has had, and is having, much success in business, and all rejoice in it. But it requires a lively fancy to endow him with the capacity to "take the helm" of the ship of state and "hold the rudder true," with an angry sea running. In Detroit at the head of and directing his great business enterprise he is placed to the best advantage. In Washington here, at the head of and directing the national government, he would be lost.

HELP IN TIME OF TROUBLE. (New York Tribune.)

Fortunately for suffering humanity, nature has not been on strike this summer. Bumper crops this fall are assured. There may be a shortage of fuel and difficulty in traveling from one town to another, but there will be plenty to eat, and it was because our forefathers had abundance at their tables that the last Thursday in November was set aside as Thanksgiving Day.

The government farm reports forecast 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn, a white potato crop that has been exceeded only once, more than twice as many apples as were grown in 1921, tobacco 10,000,000 pounds in excess of last year, and the greatest hay crop ever known in the country. Crops are wealth, and when they are unusually abundant the country prospers in proportion.

Capital and labor may wrangle over wages and working conditions, normally may be slow in returning to some industries because of misunderstandings and disinclination to make common sacrifices, but with foodstuffs piled up in every granary the country will scarcely suffer from hard times during the winter that is to come.

The hope of obtaining real information on the history of Tibet is the object of a British mission which is now on its way to the "Forbidden City." Every member of the party is a British Buddhist, and they believe through religious affiliation they can obtain what other travelers and explorers have sought in vain. Foreigners who have entered the "Forbidden City" are few and far between, and no one heretofore has been afforded the opportunity to study the religion, literature, and history of this sealed country.

The Postoffice Department has been making an effort to reduce the number of letters sent to the dead letter office. They now number about 20,000,000 a year, and they are said to represent but a small percentage of those mailed with erroneous addresses. It is urged that letters be legibly addressed, and that they bear the sender's name in the upper left-hand corner.

The late King Edward deplored the coming of the automobile, to the extent of financing the coach roads of Britain, Wales, and Ireland and patronizing them personally several times each summer.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

General Horatio Gates Gibson is the oldest living graduate of West Point. General Gibson recently passed his ninety-fifth birthday.

Miss Beatrice E. Hart of Oxford, a noted British librarian, is in Washington to reorganize the library of political and commercial reference in the British Embassy there.

Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, former United States Ambassador to China, has recently sailed for Europe on his way to Shanghai. He is returning to the Orient to resume his duties as economic adviser to the Chinese government.

Mr. Philip Guedalla is said to have figured in more Oxford novels written by other people than any other Oxonian now living. He was president of the union in his undergraduate days. Later he was the principal of Rugby School and he is the author of "The Second Empire."

Vice-Admirals Gustaf and Vilhelm Dyresen of the Royal Swedish Navy are known as the "famous twin sea dogs of Sweden." The brothers, who were born March 26, 1858, were graduated from the Swedish Royal Naval Academy in 1877 and have risen together to the highest honors.

M. Alexander Sainbunac, who recently came to America to model a bust of former President Wilson, is the leading sculptor and chief exponent of art of Jugo-Slavia. The portrait of Mr. Wilson is commissioned by the Royal Academy at Belgrade, Serbia, and is to occupy a niche in the university library there.

Mrs. Bertha Blacett of Portland, Oregon, is the only woman guide in the Yosemite National Park. She was recently commended by the government for putting out a forest fire that threatened to destroy the preserve. Mrs. Blacett beat out the flames with her saddle blanket and then with improvised shovels dug a trench around the fire zone.

Passé as thrones have become in Europe, there are yet people left to fight for even minor, unpowerful ones. The succession of Prince Louis, son of Prince Albert of Monaco, is being disputed by a former butcher, who styles himself the Most Noble Marquis George Fredrick Grimaldi. He traces his line back to Luchetti, a governor of Genoa in 1231.

Albert Payson Terhune, in addition to being a popular writer and an expert boxer, has yet another specialty. He raises collies at his place, Sunnysbank, Pompton Lakes, New Jersey, where any fine afternoon he and Mrs. Terhune can be seen taking tea entirely surrounded by collies. Most of Terhune's readers are familiar with Lad, the hero of two of his dog stories.

Mr. John A. Stewart, who reached the centenarian stage August 17th, New York banker and ex-treasury official, was one of the brisk young men whom Lincoln called to his aid during the trying days of '64. He was First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury during Cleveland's second term. Mr. Stewart is said to be the first official of the executive departments to reach the century mark.

Colonel Thomas Powell of Columbus, Ohio, veteran of the civil war and brother of the famous General Eugene Powell, is the proud owner of "Lawnmower," the only living descendant of Mary's little lamb. The original Mary was Mary Sawyer of Sterling, Massachusetts, who was eight years old at the time celebrated by the poem in 1814. The immortal verses, by the way, were written by John Roulston.

Richard Washburn Child, our ambassador to Italy, whose appointment continued the long tradition of sending a literary man to represent us at Rome, has recently joined the newly-formed American Press Association of that city. In his initial speech he asked American press representatives to give European statesmen fair play and the credit they deserve for honestly trying to solve the problems before them.

Mme. Tamaki Miura, the Japanese prima donna, who is known affectionately as "Madame Butterfly" wherever she has sung, is involved in a dramatic conflict that may prove of national significance. Her husband, Hasujiro Miura, who has accompanied the singer in her travels for the last eight years and has been, it is said, supported by the earnings of his wife's voice, has now decided that she should remain in Japan. As national custom makes a husband's word law for a wife, Mme. Tamaki must either break the Japanese custom and resume her career or give the latter up. She has indicated that she intends to keep her contracts with the Carlo and Chicago opera companies. Her decision will undoubtedly largely influence the struggle for Japanese feminine emancipation.

When Señorita Graciela Mandujano, a Chilean journalist and delegate to the recent convention of the League of Women Voters, asked for a list of the twelve greatest living women of the United States so that she could write sketches of them for Chilean papers, she little guessed what a flood of discussion she would unloose. Several dozen names have already been proposed and the qualifications of each canvassed, and finally a committee of women has asked the assistance of an equal number of men in the delicate task of choosing the candidates for Señorita Mandujano's honors. Among all the names that have been proposed there is probably but one that will mean more than name merely to South Americans; that of Annie Smith Peck, whose mountain-climbing and lecturing in South America and whose writings about that continent have made her name and personality familiar to many thousands in each of the South American states. Miss Peck has long been a famous mountain climber, her most important ascent having been that of Mt. Huascaran in Peru, which reaches a height of 21,812 feet, and whose summit she attained at great peril to her life. She has lectured in Spanish and in Portuguese before universities, clubs, and societies in all the principal cities of South America, while her books on South America are accepted by South Americans as authoritative.

OLD FAVORITES.

Seven Times One.

There's no dew left on the daisies and clover,
There's no rain left in heaven.
I've said my "seven times" over and over,—
Seven times one are seven.

I am old,—so old I can write a letter;
My birthday lessons are done.
The lambs play always,—they know no better;
They are only one times one.

O Moon! in the night I have seen you sailing
And shining so round and low.
You were bright—ah, bright—but your light is failing;
You are nothing now but a bow.

You Moon! have you done something wrong in heaven,
That God has hidden your face?
I hope, if you have, you will soon be forgiven,
And shine again in your place.

O velvet Bee! you're a dusty fellow,— You've powdered your legs with gold.
O brave marsh Mary-buds, rich and yellow.
Give me your money to hold!

O Columbine! open your folded wrapper,
Where two twin turtle-doves dwell!
O Cuckoo-pint! tell me the purple clapper
That hangs in your clear green bell!

And show me your nest, with the young ones in it,—
I will not steal them away;
I am old! you may trust me, linnet, linnet!
I am seven times one today. —Jean Ingelow.

High-Chin Bob.

(This song was brought to Santa Fé by Henry Herbert Knibbs, who got it from southern Arizona, where it was sung by the cowboys. The song was written by Charles Badger Clark, Jr., and the original version is in his "Sun and Saddle Leather" under the title of "The Glory Trail." It appears under the above title in N. Howard Thorp's "Songs of the Cowboys," Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston and New York.)

'Way high up in the Mokiones, among the mountain-tops,
A lion cleaned a yearlin's bones and licked his thankful chops;
When who upon the scene should ride, a-trippin' down the slope,
But High-Chin Bob of sinful pride and maverick-hungry rope.

"Oh, glory be to me!" says he, "an' fame's unfadin' flowers,
I ride my good top-hoss today and I'm top hand of the Lazy-J,
So Kitty-cat, you're ours!"

The lion licked his paws so brown and dreamed soft dreams of veal,
As High-Chin's loop come circlin' down and roped him round his meal;
He yowled quick fury to the world and all the hills yelled back:
That top-hoss give a snort and whirled and Bob caught up the slack.

"Oh, glory to me!" says he, "we'll hit the glory trail.
No man has looped a lion's head and lived to drag the bumper dead, Till I shall tell the tale."

'Way high up in the Mokiones that top-hoss done his best
'Mid whippin' brush and rattlin' stones from cañon-floor to crest;
Up and down and round and cross Bob pounded weak and wan,

But pride still glued him to his hoss and glory drove him on:
"Oh, glory be to me," says he, "this glory trail is rough.
I'll keep this dally round the horn until the toot of judgment morn,
Before I holler 'nough!"

Three suns had rode their circle home beyond the desert rim
And turned their star herds loose to roam the ranges high and dim,
And whenever Bob turned round and hoped the limp remains to find,
A red-eyed lion, belly-roped, but healthy, loped behind!

"Oh, glory be to me," says Bob, "he kaint be drug to death!
These heroes that I've read about were only fools that stuck it out To the end of mortal breath!"

'Way high up in the Mokiones, if you ever come there at night,
You'll hear a ruckus amongst the stones that'll lift your hair with fright;
You'll see a cow-hoss thunder by and a lion trail along,
And the rider bold, with chin on high, sings forth his glory song:

"Oh, glory be to me!" says he, "and to my mighty noose!

THE PUPPET SHOW OF MEMORY.

Maurice Baring Pulls the Strings and His Puppets Enact the Pageant of a Happy Life.

Reading Maurice Baring's autobiography, which is reported to be the non-fiction best seller in England just now, one is the victim of mixed emotions. It is such an enchanting book—and we use that hackneyed word advisedly and in its most literal sense—that the temptation is to lose oneself in this magical terrain of the past. The conflicting emotion is one of immense regret that the manner of life vivified in Mr. Baring's "Puppet Show of Memory" is a thing of the irrevocable past which can never, in our time at least, be a reality again. So we are grateful to Mr. Baring for treating us to these vicarious crumbs from his youthful banquet. Very few of us could serve them so appetizingly.

As a record of late Victorian childhood and young manhood the early chapters of Mr. Baring's memories are unique. It is not merely their charm. It is that, plus the play of a memory whose calisthenics partake of the nature of sleight-of-hand. Not that Mr. Baring is an old man—Who's Who records him as forty-eight, but the fullness and details of his recollections of his infancy are certainly remarkable. They enable him to reconstruct a period that is generally conceded to have been the happiest known to civilization. Perhaps our arboreal ancestors were even more care-free, but we doubt it.

"The Puppet Show of Memory" is not the sort of memoirs that abounds in anecdote. Most people who attempt to write their lives for commercial or vain-glorious reasons search diligently for a number of fairly good, no matter if they are old, stories and diligently ascribe them to one or another of their more or less famous friends, modestly appropriating one or two for themselves. These yarns, with some connecting tissue to the effect that "it was in the summer of 82, etc.," furnish a perfectly safe, mechanical formula for writing an autobiography. And they are very useful for review on this page, which is practically a department of anecdote. Sometimes the biographers seem almost to have borne us in mind, obligingly. But Maurice Baring's book does not lend itself to the scheme. It isn't good in spots, it is good all through, and the reader who contents himself with spots is unnecessarily depriving himself. Neither is it possible to represent Mr. Baring's life in brief, so we must content ourselves with giving a few samples of the happy era he has caught and preserved.

The lesson period with Chérie and Mrs. Christie presents an embarrassment of charming choices, so we shall first tap the stream of Mr. Baring's recollections at a boys' school to which he was sent to prepare for Eton:

In the afternoons we played Rugby football, an experience which was in my case exactly what Max Beerbohm describes it in one of his essays; running about on the edge of a muddy field. The second division master pursued the players with exhortations and imprecations, and every now and then a good kicking was administered to the less successful and energetic players, which there were quite a number of. The three best Rugby football players were allowed to wear on Sundays a light blue velvet cap with a silver Maltese cross on it, and a silver tassel. I am sorry to say that this cap was not always given to the best players. It was given to the boys the headmaster liked best. What I enjoyed most were the readings out by the headmaster, which happened on Sunday afternoons and sometimes on ordinary evenings. He read out several excellent books; "The Moonstone," the "Leavenworth Case," a lot of "Pickwick," and, during my first term, "Treasure Island." The little events, the races for stamp collecting and swopping, stage-beetle races, aquariums, secret alphabets, chess tournaments, that make up the interests of a boy's everyday life outside his work and his play, delighted me. I was a born collector, but a bad swopper, and made ludicrous bargains.

Incidentally the time spent at the private school was one of the least roseate of the young Maurice's life. His reactions to it are expressed in the following paragraph, descriptive of his début at Eton. Eton was a very different pair of boots, and the reader for whom English public school life has a fascination will revel in Baring's bright descriptions of his school days:

I enjoyed Eton from the first moment I arrived. The surprise and relief at finding one was treated like a grown-up person, that nobody minded if one had a sister called Susan or not, that all the ridiculous petty conventions of private-school life counted for nothing, were inexpressibly great.

Directly I arrived I was taken up to my tutor in his study, which was full of delightful books. He took me to the matron, Miss Copeman, whom we called McDame. I was then shown my room, a tiny room on the second floor in one of the houses opposite to the school yard. As I sat in my room, boy after boy strolled in, and instead of asking one idiotic questions they carried on rational conversation.

The next day I met Broadwood, who was at another house, and we walked up to Windsor in the afternoon. He told me all the things I had better know at once; such as not to walk on the wrong side of the street when one went up town; never to roll up an umbrella or to turn down the collar of one's great-coat; how to talk to the masters and how to talk of them; what shops to go to, and what were the sock-shops that no self-respecting boy went to. There were several such which I never entered the whole time I was at Eton, and yet I suppose they must have been patronized by some one.

Having fallen in love with Chérie, the French governess whom the infant Maurice thought "the most beautiful, the cleverest, and altogether the most wonderful person in the world," and whom he intended to marry on reaching maturity, we, too, rejoice at the successful fruit of her training. For Maurice was a proficient French scholar:

At the end of the first year there was a prize called the headmaster's prize for French, for lower boys. I competed for this. It was always rather difficult to get a French prize at Eton, as there was usually a French or a Canadian boy who spoke and knew the language like a native. There was a special examination paper for this prize. I and a French boy, whose name I have forgotten, both got 95 marks out of 100. Then the papers were looked through again, and it was found that I had translated the French word hôte by host, when it should have been guest, so the other boy was given the prize, but my tutor gave me a book as a consolation." The following year I competed for the headmaster's French prize for boys in fifth form, and that time I won it, much to the delight of Chérie and of every one at Membrand.

Naturally the literary powers of the renowned-journalist-to-be began to manifest themselves during these later school and university days. Maurice finally went to Cambridge, to Trinity, after much hesitation between that and Oxford. Always weak in math, he had preferred Oxford with its more literary traditions, but Oxford, too, had its disadvantages in its stiff classical requirements, so Maurice brushed up on "sums" and went to Cambridge. But while still at Eton he was well launched in school journalism:

There was at that time a newspaper edited by two of the boys, called the Mayfly. I sent them my poem on Eton College, but they wisely refused it. The Mayfly, edited by Ramsay, was an amusing paper, but not quite so good as the Parachute, which had come out the year before, and was edited by Carr Bosanquet and others. This was a singularly brilliant newspaper. It only had three numbers, but they were most successful. There was at the same time an exceedingly serious newspaper called the Eton Review, edited, I think, by Beauchamp, which had articles about the Baconian theory, and other rather heavy topics. During my last summer a newspaper which had twenty editors, but only one number, came out, called the Students' Humour. There was also a book published in 1891, called "Keate's Lane Papers," in which there is an excellent poem by J. K. Stephen, which has never been republished, called "The Song of the Scug." It begins:

There was a little scug
Who sat upon a rug
With a dull and empty brain,
And would show his indecision
In a twopenny diversion,
With a friend of the same low strain.
And would eat a lot of cherries and see a lot of cricket.
Till his lips and his fingers were as sticky as the wicket.
But at last he came to be a bald old man
Who talked about as wildly as a bald man can.
And he said, by Gad;
When I was a lad,
And the very best dry bob alive,
I should have made a million.
But a man in the Pavilion
Was killed by my first hard drive.

J. K. Stephen used often to come down to Eton, dressed always in slippers, a dark blue flannel blazer, and a dirty pink cap on the back of his head; and thus dressed, and reading a small book, I saw him serenely and unconsciously walk across the pitch during the Winchester match.

And here is a record of his Cambridge journalism:

In the summer term, during the May week, Hubert Cornish, R. Austen Leigh, and myself edited an ephemeral newspaper called the Cambridge A B C, which had four numbers and which contained an admirable parody of Kipling by Carr-Bosanquet.

Here are some lines from it:

By Matyushin and Wilczek-land he is come to the Northern Pole,
Whose tap-roots bite on the Oolite and Palaeozoic coal:
He set up his hand and his haunch to the tree, he plucked it up by the root,
And the lines of longitude upward sprang like the broken chords of a lute;
And over against the Hills of Glass he came to the spate of stars,
And the Pole it sank, but he swam to the bank and warmed himself on Mars;
Till he came to the Reeling Beaches between the night and the day,
Where the tall king crabs like hansom cabs and the black bull lobsters lay.

Aubrey Beardsley was just becoming known as an artist, and we wrote to him and asked him to design a cover, never thinking he would consent to do so. He did, for the modest sum of ten guineas, and many people thought it was a clever parody of his draughtsmanship.

But still before his brief stay at Cambridge was a sojourn on the Continent, particularly in Germany, where all good English children were sent for culture before the war:

The country round Heidelberg was at this time of year at its most glorious. The fields were sheets of the brightest yellow. At night choruses of nightingales sang; the air was heavy with the smell of lilacs. Sometimes we would go up the river and to the little town of Neckarsteinar, which is like a toy city on the top of a green hill, with a wall round it, and is exactly what I imagined the "green hill far away" to be when I was a child, except that it had a wall. One evening—but this was later in the summer when I went back a second time to Heidelberg—we had a Kneipe in Dr. Ihne's garden and invited the Germania Burschenschaft. Professor Ihne came and made a speech and then left us; songs were sung, and I made a speech in German, and we sang: "Alt Heidelberg du Feine."

Besides all these events, Hubert and I spent a good deal of time reading and discussing theories of life. We were intoxicated by Swinburne, spellbound by Kipling, and great devotees of Meredith and Hardy. We also read a certain amount of German, and I remember reading Lewes' "Life of Goethe." I had already read a certain amount of Goethe and Schiller with Dr. Timme, including "Herman und Dorothea," "Iphigenie auf Tauris," and "Tasso." "Faust" and the lyrics I had read by myself as soon as I could spell out the letters.

Despite the immense effort he had made to matriculate at Cambridge, our historian could not make the grade of a second year—a fact that is significant of the inefficiency of university requirements:

I left Cambridge after my first summer term as I could not pass the Little Go, nor could I ever have done so, had I stayed at Cambridge for years. My life during the next five years was a prolonged and arduous struggle to pass the examination into the diplomatic service. When I left Cambridge I went to Versailles, and stayed there a month to work at French. Then after a few days at Contrexéville, with my father, I went back to Hildesheim and stopped at Bayreuth on the way.

But if the past is magic to us, distance seems to lend no enchantment to Maurice Baring, who will not even admit the superior atmosphere, literary and artistic, of the famous and perhaps fabulous 'nineties. This was in fact the period of his university life and arduous training for the diplomatic service, so perhaps he should be pardoned for seeing it with a jaundiced eye:

This all happened in the period of the 'nineties. When people write about the 'nineties now, which they often do, they seem to me to weave a baseless legend and to create a fantastic world of their own creation. The 'nineties were, from the point of view of art and literature, much like any other period. If you want to know what literary conversation was like in the 'nineties you can hear it any day at the Reform Club. If you compare the articles on literature or art that appeared in the Speaker of 1892-3 with the articles in the New Statesman of 1921, you will find little difference between the two. The difference between the Yellow Book and periodicals of the same kind (The Owl, for instance), which were started years later, was chiefly in the color of the cover. The fact is there are only a certain number of available writers in London, and whenever a new periodical is started, all the available writers are asked to contribute; so in the Yellow Book you had practically the available writers of the time contributing—Henry James, Edmund Gosse, George Moore, Crackenthorpe, William Watson, John Davidson, John Oliver Hobbes, Vernon Lee, Le Gallienne, Arthur Benson, Arthur Symonds, and Max Beerbohm. I think there is seldom any startling difference between the literature of one decade and another. When I was at Cambridge, England was said by the newspapers to be a nest of singing birds; again the same thing was said when the Georgian poets began to publish their work; but the same thing might be said of any epoch. Throughout the whole of English history there never has been a period, as yet, when England was not a nest of singing birds, and when a great quantity of verse, good, bad, and indifferent, was not being poured out.

Nor was his indifference to the Silver Age of the Victorian era due to his own remoteness from the scene of action. On the contrary he was in the thick of the fray and the annals of Maurice Baring's twenties read like a roster of the names that characterize the happy 'nineties:

On Sunday evenings I used often to have supper with Edmund Gosse at his house in Delamere Terrace, and there I met some of the lights of the literary world: George Moore, Rider Haggard, Henry Harland, and Max Beerbohm. Sometimes there would be serious discussions on literature between George Moore, Edmund Gosse, and Arthur Symonds. I remember once, when Swinburne was being discussed, Arthur Symonds saying that there was a period in every one's life when one thought Swinburne's poetry not only the best, but the only poetry worth reading. It seemed then to annihilate all other verse. Edmund Gosse then said that he would not be at all surprised if some day Swinburne's verse were to appear almost unintelligible to future generations. He thought it possible that Swinburne might survive merely as a literary curiosity, like Cowley. He also said that Swinburne in his later manner was like a wheel that spun round and round without any intellectual cog.

George Moore in those days was as severe on Guy de Maupassant, and said his stories were merely carved cherry-stones. Edmund Gosse contested this point hotly. Still more amusing than the literary discussions were those occasions when Edmund Gosse would tell us reminiscences of his youth, when he worked as a boy at the British Museum, and of the early days of his friendship with Swinburne.

Preoccupied as our hero was at this time "learning arithmetic, geography, and long lists of obscure terms of French and German" preparatory to passing the examination prerequisite to a diplomatic career, he was not too engrossed to have his latent literary ambitions swept into flame by the same potent spirit of the 'nineties. It was Edmund Gosse who first encouraged him, for he had kept his aspirations dark at Cambridge:

One night, at Edmund Gosse's, in the winter of 1905, Harland was there, and the conversation turned on Anatole France. I quoted him some passages from "Le Livre de Mon Ami," which he had not read. The name of Anatole France had not yet been mentioned in the literary press of London, and Harland said to me: "Why don't you write me an article about him and I will print it in the Yellow Book?" The Yellow Book by that time had lost any elements of surprise or newness it had ever had and had developed into an ordinary review to which the stock writers of London reviews contributed. I said I would try, and I wrote an article about Anatole France, which was accepted by Harland and came out in the April number. This was the first criticism of Anatole France which appeared in England. In the same number there was a story by Anatole France himself, and a long poem by William Watson. When the proof of my article came, I took it to Edmund Gosse, and read it aloud to him in his office at the Board of Trade in Whitehall. He was pleased with it, and his meed of generous and discriminating praise and encouragement was extremely welcome and exhilarating. He said there was a unique opportunity for any one who should make it his aim to write gracefully and delicately about beautiful and distinguished things, and that I could not do better than try to continue as I had begun. No one could have been kinder or more encouraging.

Though his residence days at Cambridge were so unsatisfactory, our author was yet to discover the charm of English university life at Oxford. At Oxford he was to relive the exhilaration of Eton, which Mr. Baring thinks very like Balliol. Though not in residence at Oxford, he lived there for two terms exactly as an undergraduate.

We regret the lack of space to sketch in the remainder of Mr. Baring's delightful book. Suffice it to say that after a still further period of cramming in Germany he passed the official examinations, though he suspected that the grade given him in arithmetic was a gift, since on a comparison of his answers with those of the other candidates after the examination he found that his "answers in no ways coincided with theirs." He was finally admitted and appointed to the African Department. However, his diplomatic and journalistic careers are well known and it is rather the history of his unusually fortunate youth that marks his book aside. We agree with the London Observer that Maurice Baring's autobiography illustrates the finest phase of our late civilization.

THE PUPPET SHOW OF MEMORY. By Maurice Baring. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $5.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending August 19, 1922, were $147,700,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $120,600,000; an increase of $27,100,000.

Judge R. S. Lovett, chairman of the board of directors of the Union Pacific Railroad, called as a witness recently before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, made some very definite statements in reply to the charges that the railroads are controlled by a small group of Wall before the Senate committee by Mr. Lauck, representing the railroad brotherhoods, Judge Lovett said:

"I state now, and as broadly and as emphatically as I can, that during all the years I have been a director and officer of railroad companies, the management and policies of each system have been in its own interest alone, as distinct from the other systems, and have been as separately in all respects as if there had been no common directors; that there has been no combination or common control or direction of them; that none of the banks or financial institutions mentioned by Mr. Lauck or shown on his exhibits, and no other bank, banker, or financial institution or groups of such have controlled or sought to control them, or had anything to do with the policies or management or with the business or affairs of any of said railroad companies, so far as I know or believe, except in lending them money or buying their securities."

Touching directly the charge that bankers were influencing railroad officials in their efforts to reduce wages, Judge Lovett said:

"No banker or any board of directors, or committee, at any time or place, has ever given me any advice or sought in any way to influence me as to the 'deflation of wages' of railroad labor or as to what wages should be paid to or what working rules and regulations should be established for, or what if any contract should be made with railroad labor, or had anything whatever to do with the policy of railroad management with respect to railroad labor. All the bankers with whom I have had anything to do or with whom I come in contact, on or off railroad boards, or in railroad management, have shown a friendly attitude toward labor, union labor at that, so far as I ever heard any expression from them on this subject."

"The fact is that the bankers are no more concerned about railroad labor than are other wide-awake citizens and manifest no more interest in the subject. The larger banks in New York, at which much of the denouncement has been leveled, and other investment bankers, own little if any railroad stocks. These bankers do not buy stocks to keep, but to sell, just as the merchant buys goods to sell. They sell as quickly as possible after they buy in order to buy again, for their profit is in the turnover. What interest have they, therefore, in the railroad wage question, more than any other citizen. It is the stockholder, and on weak roads sometimes the bondholders, who are interested in wages and working rules and conditions, because as they had been going in recent years these expenses may mean the loss of their property."

There are 106,000,000 Americans affected by the railway strike; 42,000,000 engaged in gainful occupations, 1,800,000 engaged in transportation work, 400,000 in railroad shop crafts, 1,000,000 railroad stockholders, and 1,000,000 railroad bondholders. There are 11,000,000 Americans engaged in agriculture, which now seems to suffer most from the railroad strike, says McDonnell & Co.

The total transportation employees are 4 1/2 per cent. of the total working population. In 1921 they received wages amounting to 7 per cent. of the nation's purchasing power. There are 26 per cent. of the working population engaged in farming and they receive 20 per cent. of the nation's purchasing power.

David Friday, president of the Michigan Agricultural College, says: "To put it briefly and strikingly, there are six times as many workers in agriculture as in railroad transportation, and yet they receive only three times as much of the nation's production as did the railroad workers."

The average compensation of railroad employees increased from $730 in 1911 to $1004 in 1917, $1820 in 1918, and is now about $1540. To quote David Friday again: "Half of all the rates collected by the railroads is paid directly to railroad labor. The amount which the men receive as wages is still approximately four times as large as the sum which is left for interest, dividends, and surplus. The return which the railroads are making upon their investments is on the average so far below the return in other competitive lines, like manufacturing and banking, that no great reduction in freight rates is possible without a lowering in wages."

A new issue of $400,000 Wyoming Sugar Company 7 1/2 per cent. first (closed) lien sinking fund gold bonds, due August 1, 1937, price 100 and interest to yield 7 1/2 per cent., is being offered by Carstens & Earles, Inc.

These bonds will be a direct obligation of the Wyoming Sugar Company and will constitute a first and only lien on a modern fireproof sugar refining plant and equipment located at Worland, Wyoming, appraised for us in June, 1922, by Messrs. Graham and Rasmussen, engineers and appraisers, Denver, Colorado, at $1,190,000, and having a minimum daily capacity of 725 tons of beets. These properties are carried on the company's books at $978,404.13, which is less a depreciation charge of $222,066.37. After giving effect to this financing the total net quick assets exceed $350,000. The company, through stock ownership, also owns, in the vicinity of Worland, land having a net equity value of $155,000, which is additional security for this loan.

In common with other operating beet sugar refiners, heavy inventory losses were sustained by the company during 1920 and 1921, due to the rapid price declines and the country-wide depression then prevailing. Notwithstanding these losses, of approximately $125,000, the three-year period ending February 28, 1922, showed net operating earnings, before interest payment and depreciation, of $177,773, equal to $59,257.80 per annum, or approximately twice the interest requirements on this bond issue. The company is today marketing sugar at a substantial profit. Conservative authorities estimate the earnings available for interest on this issue for 1922 at $140,000, or more than four times interest requirements.

The security markets of the past fortnight have continued to show the utmost confidence in the face of disturbing news at home and from abroad, which can only be explained by the belief that these difficulties are not as menacing as they appear and that their solution is not far distant. The refusal of the railroad executives to accept in full the President's plan for settlement of the railway shopmen's strike seemingly was a most unfavorable development, indicating a long-drawn-out struggle, but the stock market has not regarded it in this light. After a little hesitation the rail list became very strong, and since then many new high prices—for years—have been recorded. The railroad managers apparently feel that they have the situation well in hand, and the ability of the Eastern roads to spare shop workers to help out some of the badly stricken Southern lines seems to confirm this view. While there have been some threats from the four big brotherhoods, it is not likely that these latter will ally themselves with a losing cause. The coal strikes also appear to be in the way of early settlement.

The German reparations matter seems a hopeless muddle, with France talking of seizing the Ruhr Valley and advancing to the Rhine, while the German mark has declined close to the vanishing point. The Balfour note on war debts has created in Wall Street mixed feelings of puzzlement and annoyance, but it is probable that it is intended chiefly for French consumption and is merely another step in the eternal jockeying of European politics, as a help to Lloyd George in his efforts to secure more favorable terms with the French premier in the matter of German reparations. Certainly we shall not feel much inclined to cancel, or even scale down, our perfectly just and collectible debts so long as France and the other European countries involved persist in continuing their huge and wasteful expenditures for armament. However, the situation is probably not as dark as it appears, and the market's appraisal is doubtless correct, just as when, some six or eight weeks before the armistice, it plainly indicated the early ending of the war, while official Washington, London, and Paris were most vehemently denying any such possibility.

strikes, reports of industrial activity throughout the country continue most encouraging, with steady expansion in nearly all lines. Money continues plentiful, with no indications of an early change to higher interest rates, which has been reflected in higher prices for investment securities, making it increasingly important to discriminate in their selection.—The Trader.

Ex-Senator Beveridge, who is again a candidate for the United States Senate, has written an article which appeared in a recent edition of the Nation's Business, which must bring consternation to the Borah, La Follette, and Johnson brand of agitators. They can not hope either for consolation or assistance from Beveridge, if he is elected. In this article he advocates the repeal of the Sherman law, the abolition of war-time taxes, the levy of a sales tax to raise revenue, the wiping from the statute-books of all the tom-foolery laws and regulations which have hampered and nearly bankrupted the railroads of the United States, the freeing of all business from tyrannical regulations, and lastly, and by no means least, he is unalterably opposed to the soldiers' bonus. He has evidently divested himself of the influence and heresies of the blustiferous and iconoclastic Roosevelt, at whose feet he was at one time an ardent worshiper.

In this age of claptrap nonsense from public men, this article of ex-Senator Beveridge's is most cheering reading. More strength to his elbow, and let's hope he is elected.—

Japan is the one important country of the world with which our 1922 trade shows an increase. Our imports from the whole world in the fiscal year 1922, says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York, show a fall of 28 per cent. in value, while from Japan alone our imports show an increase of 18 per cent. The 1922 exports to the whole world show a reduction of 42 per cent. in value, while those to Japan show an increase of 30 per cent. The imports from Japan in the fiscal year 1922 approximate $300,000,000 against $253,000,000 in the fiscal year 1921, and the exports to that country in 1922 were approximately $245,000,000 against $189,000,000 in the preceding year. This estimate of the 1922 trade with Japan is based upon official figures of eleven months while those of the trade with the whole world during the full fiscal year are official.

Practically all of the increase in our imports from Japan occurs in raw silk, while the increase on the export side includes a large number of manufactured articles. True, raw cotton is the biggest single item in our exports to Japan, but the number of manufactured articles which that country now takes from the United States is steadily increasing and in a dozen or more of the important manufactures the figures of 1922 show an increase in value when compared with 1921, while in most cases the increase in quantity is much greater than that of mere value.

The largest high-tension electric switches ever built are now being installed by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in its Pit River hydro-electric development. These switches, six in number, weigh upwards of thirty tons each and are nearly eighteen feet high. Approximately 2000 gallons of oil, used as an insulating medium, are required for each switch.

The switches were specially built by the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company at East Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and are being installed at both ends of the 220,000-volt line, now under construction by the P. G. & E. Co. through the upper Sacramento Valley. Three switches will be placed in service at Pit No. 1 power house in Shasta County and three at the company's Vaca substation, near Dixon.

While the switches are designed to operate on a 220,000-volt system, they have been subjected to a test of 350,000 volts, over 50 per cent. higher than the normal operating voltage. In addition to being the largest in actual size, the switches are also constructed to break the highest voltage current ever utilized in a commercial way.

The kill-joys are still on the job. Disappointed, apparently, to find that Wall Street, equipped with full knowledge of basic conditions, refused to allow itself to be disturbed by the admittedly black clouds hanging over the transportation and coal industries, they are now busy blocking transcontinental wires with jeremiads bemoaning the shortsightedness of those who should know better than to remain cheerful when the end of the trouble is in sight, says R. Berkeley of Strassburger & Co. The decline in Steel Corporation's operations, a possibly larger one in the activities of the independent companies, a supposed 10 per cent. shutting down of blast furnaces, stories of defective railroad equipment here and there—wonderful, is it not, that the country dares to hold together? Less than two months would suffice to offset all these setbacks, in the strong upswing in production that is sure to follow any relief to the situation, unless all previous experience of similar happenings counts for nothing as a guide to what may be looked for.

There never has been but one correct race to turn to trouble, that described as the stiff upper lip, and this does not imply turning a blind eye to facts that can not be denied. A year hence how small will what we have lately been through look, compared with the development that will have manifested itself in the whole industrial position? Bruin is a persistent beast, but stock markets have had enough of him for the present. The upward trend is too assured to leave him a chance of any activity beyond spasmodic and short-lived raids.

Business is being conducted for the most part conservatively and the number of July failures declined 42 per cent. from the peak level of last January. As compared with July, 1921, the liabilities involved showed a falling off of 40 per cent., although individual failures were slightly more numerous. Brad-streets' figures for the first seven months of 1922 show total liabilities of $436,317,285, this being a decrease of 4.3 per cent. from the same months in 1921. Various other signs shows that the deflation movement has been pretty well completed in most industries and that the country is gradually readjusting itself to a sane price level and resuming normal business methods. There are indications also that the margin between earning capacity and expense is increasing and that the average family is now living more nearly within its means.—Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank.

The security markets during the past fortnight have given a most impressive demonstration of strength in the face of our own serious strike difficulties and the sinister possibilities of the situation in Europe. The markets rarely err on matters of this sort, so that, in spite of the statements of labor leaders, railway executives, and coal-mine operators, apparently indicating a deadlock, we may expect these troubles to be settled soon.
 The unofficial statement that Great Britain is willing to cancel the French debt to her, provided the latter agree to a reduction of the German indemnity from 132,000,000,000 gold marks to 50,000,000,000, has been followed by reports that France is now willing to accord
 Germany at least a temporary moratorium.
 There are now grounds for hoping that France is at last preparing to take a sensible view of the matter, and that the way will soon be opened for the flotation of a German loan, together with supervision by the Allies of that country's finances.

The prospects for the continuance of easy money have been reflected in new high prices for Liberty Bonds and other investment securities, and it looks like the trend here continues upward.

The second quarter's reports of United States Steel, Republic Iron & Steel, Colorado Fuel & Iron and Gulf States Steel are most encouraging, showing a profit in spite of the coal strike and in the cast of the last mentioned earnings at the annual rate of over $6 a share on the common stock.

Prices for some of the listed oil stocks have receded as a result of two 25-cents-per-barrel cuts in the price of domestic crude oil, followed by some shading in gasoline prices.
 This year has seen such an intensive and successful drilling campaign that the production of crude oil has exceeded the facilities of the refiners. However, this condition is not apt to be aggravated or even to continue, as the consumption of gasoline is running at a record rate, with prospects of increasing, while the intermittent coal labor troubles are driving more and more manufacturers into the use of oil as fuel. In the face of these many apparently unfavorable factors the average of the industrial stocks on July 19th reached a new high level for the year. This, following similar action on the part of the railroad list on July 6th, seemingly furnishes unmistakable evidence that we are still in a bull market, with the trend strongly upward.

The equipment stocks have been among the leaders in the rise. The steels also have been strong, especially Republic and Midvale, whose combination in the proposed North American Steel Company has been approved by the Attorney-General. Rails have been very firm, with some sharp advances in the case of the standard issues and the more speculative non-dividend payers.

The market looks like a decided purchase, but much discrimination should be exercised in making one's selections. Among the rails,
 New York Central, Pere Marquette, Pittsburgh & West Virginia, Wheeling & Lake Eries, Atlantic Coast Line, Norfolk & Western, St. Pauls, Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Southern Pacific and Chicago & Northwestern look good. Of the industrials, Columbia Gas, Allis Chalmers, Baldwin, American Locomotive, Railway Steel Spring,
 Worthington Pump, Brown Shoe, Republic,
 Midvale, Replogle and Sloss Sheffield Steels, nickel and the better coppers, International Paper, General Asphalt and Marland all seem excellent purchases for the next ninety days.

slugger, murderous striker, or any other brand of infamous trouble-makers. This declaration has put heart into those who were despondent over the Herrin affair and the rebellion against the government in the Kern River oil fields in 1921. They hope that the criminals engaged in these two affairs will yet be brought to justice. His remarks must have been particularly cutting and aggravating to cowardly executives everywhere, . . . who have abdicated their functions, on several occasions, in favor of strikers. The courts of the country have repeatedly announced the same doctrine, but no President since Grover Cleveland has had the courage, manhood, and patriotism to make such an announcement as President Harding did.

The textile mills strike seems to have worn itself out and many of the strikers have gone back to work, quite a number of the mills now operating on a 75 per cent. capacity basis.

Owing to present business activity, money is still plentiful, and interest rates rule low.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Several months or weeks ago we ran across a reference to a book called "Maurice Guest," by some one named Richardson, in John o' London's Weekly. Though fairly familiar with most English novels, we were ignorant of "Maurice Guest" and were amazed to read in the English weekly that it was a very pearl among novels and that it was largely responsible for the modern English school of fiction. Duffield & Co. have recently obligingly issued a new edition of this book—it first appeared in 1908—and our conclusion on finishing it is that it is a pity it did not influence the younger British novelists, as Hugh Walpole and others have claimed. If the influence is there it is extraordinarily well concealed, for, rather violently to twist the meaning of the ancient simile, "Maurice Guest" was veritably a case of margueritas ante porcas. Or if the mythical person, Henry H. Richardson, has had his effect on English literature we hate to think what it would have been without him. But if it is true, as Mr. Walpole (who writes the introduction to the present edition) says, that Richardson has been a power among his successors it is easy to understand why the book is not better known. We do not mean it as a libel on human nature or on novelist nature, but we can understand that if a budding genius had come upon "Maurice Guest," whose author seems never to have been come upon—most conveniently for the nascent genius—and had read, reread, and assimilated this marvelous book, that if the forming powers Mr. Walpole talks of had begun to form his hitherto chaotic work, we repeat, we can understand that he would not advertise the fact that his now blooming talents were in their happy florescent state as a direct result of exposure to "Maurice Guest." Particularly as Mr. Richardson seems not to have been on the scene to claim his just dues. This is perhaps a bit fantastic. But there must be some good reason why a book of the remarkable quality of this one is not better known. And, in America at least, it is practically unknown. Who was Henry H. Richardson? In all the publicity that is being given the Duffield edition no light is thrown on that mystery nor is the author's identity referred to by Mr. Walpole further than his saying, "Maurice Guest" is founded, one can not doubt, on actual experience—that is, its author has known at first hand Leipzig, its musical life, and persons living there who could at any rate quite legitimately exist in the same world as Louise, Schilsky, Krafft, Madeline, Ephie Cayhill, and the rest. . . .

Did the mysterious creator of this vivid cross section of German student life die upon completion of his chef d'œuvre? Did the gods exact this penalty for having so closely imitated their craft? We have another theory. Mr. Richardson may come forward tomorrow and publish his portrait and his identity broadcast or his heirs may do so for him. But meanwhile we believe that he never existed. It wouldn't be human to sit quietly by in England and let the rising generation, whom one always hates, anyway, on principle, crib, if not the content, at least the glory of one's masterpiece.

So much for the psychology of the case. We are aided in our theory by a fact and an analogy. The former relates to the greater familiarity of the women characters of "Maurice Guest." Vivid as the men are and lifelike in the extreme, yet they are done objectively—this despite the fact the name character is a man. But he is even more shadowy than the cad Schilsky, who is obviously a woman's ideal bad man. And, moreover, Maurice, natural though he is, has the familiarity of a person rather than of a male. He is a mind rather than a man. The latter, the analogy mentioned above, refers to another novel of German life of a similar, perhaps a little earlier era, and which "Maurice Guest" is constantly reminiscent of. We mean the Baroness Tautphœus' "Initials." It is years since we read "Initials," and its outlines were lost in the haze of time, but little by little they emerged and took shape in reading "Maurice Guest." At any rate the great obscurity about the latter book lends color to the theory. For if perchance the Baroness Tautphœus had written it, it would be clear that, immersed in her German life far from the literary circles of England, it would be practically immaterial to her what influence her book had on a foreign land or its letters. One is irresistibly intrigued by the thought of a German authoress molding English letters. But of course the theory is only a fancy, and if we remember correctly, the Baroness Tautphœus was an Englishwoman married to a Teuton. But at least we put forth a plea for "Initials," whether or not its author is also responsible for "Maurice Guest," for the book appeared in English, was read by the same few who were supposedly formed by "Maurice Guest," and they bear a striking resemblance to each other.

R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

It is calculated that A. S. M. Hutchinson will net about $500,000 on "If Winter Comes," since about three-fourths of that sum has already been realized.

Most readers of books with an Anglo-French interest know Mme. Duclaux, who was first married to James Darmesteter, the Persian scholar. While she was still Miss Mary Robinson she wrote a delightful volume entitled "An Italian Garden," and it was Darmesteter's appreciation of it that brought them together. Mme. Duclaux has been in London renewing old friendships, for she lives in Paris, and making arrangements to publish a new volume of essays. They will be both literary and artistic, for Mme. Duclaux' culture is wide, and she is a poetess. With her, as with other people, new books often have an unexpected origin, and her last one, a popular history of France, she wrote for first reading by an English officer keen about the history of France.

Van Wyck Brooks has translated Emile's "Jean-Jacques Rousseau" into English. This biographical and critical sketch of Rousseau, which was delivered by Amiel on the hundredth anniversary of the former's death, has never before appeared in English. It is now being published by B. W. Huebsch. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that these two authors of world-famous "confessions" were both Genevese.

Lieber & Lewis announce the early publication of a new series of unusual one-act and longer plays to fit the needs of the little theatres throughout the country as well as scattered amateur dramatic groups, whom the publishers believe will furnish the acting and play-writing material of the future. Pierre Loving has been chosen to be the editor of the Little Playhouse Series. Material for the series, which will exhibit a wide variety in theme and treatment, will be drawn from both European and American sources. The first number of the series will be on sale at all bookshops some time in September.

Word comes from the Houghton Mifflin Company that Amy Lowell is directing her literary forces in new channels. She has been engaged for months in the preparation of a Life of Keats, which will, however, not be ready for publication before 1923. The volume will prove of extraordinary interest to book lovers of every nationality. It contains a number of rare finds, notably six unpublished letters, several extracts from hitherto unknown letters from Fanny Brawne, and a number of rare portraits, notably one of Keats' brother, Thomas.

Ford Madox Hueffer, the veteran British critic, writing of the younger generation of English novelists, calls them "a haughty and proud generation: vigorous and free in their passions and adventures"—quoting Pushkin. Mr. Hueffer is referring particularly to such writers as Frank Swinnerton, D. H. Lawrence, Katherine Mansfield, Wyndham Lewis, Clemence Dane, Dorothy Richardson, and James Joyce. The practice of the short story as an art, which once engaged such men of genius as Kipling and Wells, Mr. Hueffer now finds in abeyance except for the work of Miss Mansfield, whose collections "Bliss" and "The Garden Party" have lately been published in this country. Although he traces Mr. Swinnerton's literary descent from Gissing and Miss Dane's from Henry James, he regards them as assailing the "Modern Position" from a common angle. Of Wyndham Lewis he writes: "In the discussions, Mr. Lewis shows himself an extraordinarily great artist, not, heaven knows, in what his characters say, but in the rendering of their temperamental and physical reactions one upon the other. Mr. Lawrence is a great realist—except when he is recording conversations." Of James Joyce, Mr. Hueffer has high hopes as "a writer of very beautifully composed English."

Claude Lovat Fraser, the English artist, who became universally known through his decorations for "The Beggar's Opera," will probably have even a greater influence on the taste of future generations than on his own. For one of his last works before his premature death was an edition of Mother Goose Rhymes, illustrated in color and black and white, to be published soon in this country by Alfred A. Knopf. Whenever a great talent is turned to juvenile decorations one is reminded of the remark of an English celebrity who said that the real wonder was that the generation raised on Kate Greenaway and Frederick Locker-Lampson was not even more brilliant and more distinguished for good taste than it was.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Heartbeat.

The publishers of Stacy Aumonier's "Heartbeat" quote Meredith's "If a man can not write a good story, why should he write at all?" Whether Mr. Aumonier bore it in mind or not, we wish that more novelists would familiarize themselves with the cryptic piece of criticism. And the author of "Heartbeat" might very well have used it as a criterion. For "Heartbeat" is the sort of book one has to finish, not because you particularly like the characters or because the theme is fresh or familiar or different, but because the author has dramatically marshaled his forces and because he knows his readers' psychology. In this respect he is like Leonard Merrick, to whom, in fact, he is frequently compared. And it is a trait which more writers might imitate in Mr. Merrick with impunity from the charge of plagiarism.

Nevertheless, "Heartbeat" has an unusual plot and an unusual dramatic persona—the freshness and lifelikeness of the latter being doubtless due to their having been drawn from life. That is the general impression, at least, which is not shattered by its heroine being the daughter of a famous chancellor of the exchequer and the wife of a famous comedian. We hasten to confess that we do not recognize either of these personages, but they are lifelike in the extreme. Barbara, herself, is very convincing, and one would not be very much surprised to have her identified with any one of the leading stage beauties of a generation ago.

Probably it is because of his preoccupation with stage life that Stacy Aumonier is compared most often with Leonard Merrick. It is sometimes speculated why, in view of their similarity of temperament and theme, Merrick is popular in America and Aumonier is not. We think we found the answer in "Heartbeat," the first of its author's to come our way. Mr. Aumonier has the same fascinating facility for story-telling as his better-known prototype, often the same charm and delicacy, and their themes are similar. Neither is one annoyed by the analogy, as there is no hint of plagiarism, since both are original artists. The trouble, in fact, is to be found in their one marked difference. Where Merrick leaves one soaring in the—probable—mirage of human kindness and ultimate decency, Aumonier drops you headlong and shocked into a mud puddle that murky reflects the not too rosy life above it.

Little Women.

"Little Women" is again in the foreground, the American Library Association having put it on its list of essentials for a school library, and Little, Brown & Co. have obligingly brought out an attractive inexpensive edition to supply the demand. Jessie Wilcox Smith has made eight delightful designs in color that exactly illustrate one's own idea of the homely scenes and graces of the Marches. So that the edition is bound to be treasured by youngsters everywhere.

The publishers have also issued a little booklet condensed from Ednah D. Cheney's "Louisa May Alcott: Her Life, Letters, and Journals," apropos of the restoration and proposed preservation of the Orchard House in Concord, where most of the events of "Little Women" occurred and where the book was written. To any one not familiar with the larger biographies and memoirs of the Alcotts this pamphlet is extremely interesting, perhaps most particularly for the photographs, since every member of the family is represented. Louisa, the ugly duckling, and Meg, the beauty, turning out to be twinesquely similar, the advantage, if any, rather lying with Louisa. And the actual facts of the sisters' lives are rather different from those of the book, autobiographical though it is. One's chief reaction to a perusal of the little book is an even greater admiration for the stoical character of Louisa Alcott.

The Fair Rewards

A fullness of theme and a slenderness of plot characterize Thomas Beer's "The Fair Rewards." The novel, in addition to its being a study in sentimentalism, is a true story of the American stage, giving intimate glimpses of such celebrities of the past twenty years as Charles Frohman and Anna Held. Of the three kinds of sentimentalists exposed in the story, the unconscious and the rampant varieties are nearly eclipsed by the almost extreme type—the willing sentimentalist. To this breed belongs the hero, Mark Walling, a figure found in every American theatre. He is the half artist who is at once pulled and repelled by beauty. Contrasted with a sophisticated younger generation, Mark appears pathetic in his illusions and his simple faith in the success of his silly theatre. In talking—it can not be called conversing—Mark has a disconcerting habit of babbling along, jumping from one subject to another without any logical connection whatsoever. The conversation of the other characters at times becomes satirically brilliant.

One of the outstanding features of the book is the unusual manner by which the author brings about a change of scene, which happens with measured frequency. It is like the hero's conversation—the reader is in the midst of one scene to be suddenly dropped down without any obvious transition into a new setting and sometimes after a considerable lapse of time—a manoeuvre doubtless intended to suggest stage atmosphere.

Readers of his frequent contributions to Century, Smart Set, and other magazines will welcome this first novel of Mr. Beer's.

Co-Operation in Water Service

A working relationship of co-operation—that explains how it has become possible to increase your water supply by the addition of 24 million gallons daily from Spring Valley's Calaveras Reservoir.

This working relationship of co-operation has been established between Spring Valley and the city of San Francisco.

The city and company are co-operating to bring to San Francisco the additional supply of water so urgently needed, according to the terms of an agreement worked out in conformity with certain regulations laid down by the Railroad Commission.

The 24 million gallons daily of additional water will be brought into service through a new Spring Valley aqueduct and through the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit.

The company pays the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds for the construction of the city's conduit, and also pays for using it.

This co-operation between city and company constitutes a virtual partnership. It is something entirely new in the relations between a city and a privately-owned water company. It is a forward stride in water service.

Nowhere else in the United States does such a water arrangement exist.

It was made possible in San Francisco because there was a proper understanding of our rapidly growing water needs by those charged with responsibility—the Railroad Commission, the city, and the company.

THE ORPHEUM.

Dancing, singing, mind-reading, and monologizing constitute the Orpheum tricks this week. One of the trickiest of the tricks is by Jean Barrios, who, fashionably gowned, sings several love songs feelingly, although in a voice that has cat-like tones. However, we accept the modish young lady for what she seems to be, with her slender, shapely legs, her swelling chest, and her sufficiently feminine, good-looking face. We vaguely felt, however, the absence of feminine charm, which was suddenly accounted for when a baritone note issued from the artistically reddened lips and we discovered that we had been fooled. Like Julian Eltinge—who, by the way, he impersonates—Jean Barrios runs to "gown creations" and dainty feminine airs. After his sex is revealed the young man rings the changes on his two voices, and on the whole gives an effective act.

Another solo act is that of Lew Dockstader, who, in characteristic style, discourses amusingly on the topics of the day, paying his compliments particularly to prohibition and politics.

Prohibition, indeed, is a mine of wealth to vaudeville entertainers. What in the world would they do if the world suddenly went wet? Imagination reels at the awful thought. While the stomachs joyfully gurgled with alcoholic content the joke-box would be almost empty.

Bob Murphy is another joker on the invaluable topic. Bob has an enormous voice, a minute girl partner, some not particularly amusing songs, but a very successful vaudeville manner. On the subject of the alcohol famine he speaks with that tender regret that wakes echoes of hilarious response in the audience.

The princess—no, the Princess—Wahletka is a real American Indian seeress. Sure thing, for she wears a fringed and beaded Indian costume. The princess converses in English pure and almost undefiled, and reads minds across the theatre, answering questions that are not uttered, but whose correct divination is acknowledged by the persons concerned.

Several score people thus silently interrogated destiny, the answers being delivered aloud in the penetrating accents of the princess, who seemed to feel a genial reluctance to give any but favorable or semi-favorable replies to the silent questions. Which makes us think—but begone, intruding doubt.

Emma Carus and her young associate, J. Walter Leopold, gave an act of hearty fun that kept the audience in high good humor. Emma, like Trixie Friganza, frolics all over the stage like a good-natured baby elephant. makes fun of herself and her somewhat plump proportions, and alludes irreverently to old Father Time in terms that include the color of her hair and the length of her service as a public entertainer. In spite of the solidity that she so gayly derides the popular favorite dances with considerable agility, becoming good-naturedly blown during the exercise, and freely confiding her discomforts to her delighted and indulgent audience.

In the Roscoe Ails act the dancing is the real thing. Mr. Ails himself, Kate Pullman, his feminine aid, and the two jazz performers displaying very complicated and brilliantly executed steps to the lively music of a syncopation orchestra; which also is the real thing. Mr. Ails and Kate Pullman have a lot of rather insane comedy, but when the company gets to dancing then we regard them with considerably enhanced respect.

The most ornate and high-class act of the entire programme is that of the Marmein sisters, who present a series of dramatic dances, including some versified lines very well spoken by the accomplished pair. The sisters, who are toe dancers, show much grace and agility, and dance with the lightness and joyousness of the born dancer. Their story dances are tastefully set off with effective backgrounds, sets, and costumes, and go with dramatic verve.

Much taste and originality is shown in the costumes, one dance in particular—that illustrating the Mother Goose story of the queen whose crack-a-jack tarts were stolen—being an exceedingly lovely stage picture. The costumes contain suggestions of the queen and the knave on a pack of cards, and also of the figures in a fairy tale. And as the two dainty little figures go through the pantomime of accusation, reproach, penitence, and forgiveness, dancing the while the prettiest of illustrative steps and poses, one felt as if this one of the popular child myths had suddenly burst into lovely, dancing life.

The grace and buoyancy with which the Marmein sisters dance is attained partly by severe exercise, and at the Wednesday matinee of the coming week the two girls are going to extend invitations to people in the audience to dance with them on the stage, and possibly to receive a few helpful hints.

This will not be like the Tango shoe act, in which four or five volunteers come up from the auditorium and exhibit their talents and their freak appearance; for these participants are there to be at once skillful and ridiculous, and to persuade the rubes in the audience that they are really volunteers instead of paid performers.

THE ART THEATRE OF MOSCOW.

Bolshevism in Russia has had the effect of causing Russian art to migrate to other nations. The Russian patricians—such of them as could get away—and the intelligentsia of the proscribed bourgeoisie are all over Europe. And for some reason—perhaps to ward off hostility toward Russia—the Bolsheviks in authority have been not wholly unwilling that the torch of Russian art should be carried aloft in other countries.

And so, whether or not the long-pending arrangements for bringing the company of the Art Theatre from Moscow to America are completed, it is very evident that we in the United States are going to have the long-desired opportunity to witness the flower of Russian dramatic art.

The Art Theatre of Moscow has had just a quarter of a century of existence. At first there was a struggle to maintain that existence, for Russians, like other nationalities, whatever they are now, have had their conservatism in the past toward new art movements.

It was started by a dramatist of Moscow, who was backed by a wealthy citizen interested in dramatic art. Other citizens helped out, though rather sparingly, and the players themselves became shareholders in the infant organization.

The Art Theatre did not initiate its career with a determination to exploit Russian art. Far from it, for of the first five plays which were rehearsed—in a barn on the country place of one of the organizers—one was a Shakespearean play, one Italian, one Hauptmann's "Hannele," one the Greek tragedy, "Antigone," and one a historical play by Tolstoy. None of them succeeded, and it was Tchekov who saved the day with his "Sea Gull."

This play immediately scored an immense success, and the Art Theatre was firmly established. Tchekov's plays became largely identified with the Art Theatre; so that it has frequently been said that the Art Theatre made Tchekov's plays and Tchekov's plays made the Art Theatre.

Tchekov understood his compatriots, and loved them as well. In his plays we meet the social, gregarious, talkative Russian of the intelligentsia class; the class to which Tchekov, a doctor by profession, belonged. Tchekov, like many Russians, was the soul of hospitality. Innumerable friends and relatives, at his urgent invitation, visited him for indefinite seasons, and, turning night into day, indulged in the unending talkfests in which the typical Russian delights. No doubt that, in spite of the toll these guests made on his scanty means, Tchekov unconsciously made profit from his guests by using them as models for the numerous thumb-nail sketches drawn by his prolific pen, and for the very human and often lovable characters in his plays.

It would seem, after all, as if Russians, instinctive cosmopolitans though they are, liked best the plays which showed up the national character in not too condemning as well as not too flattering a light. For these open-minded, large-hearted beings, with their easy Russian tolerance and their utter lack of that smugness which seems to turn certain brands of respectability into hypocrisy, appealed to the Russian heart.

So a sea-gull became the emblem of the Art Theatre. But during the five years of struggle that followed translations of the plays of famous European dramatists of other nationalities were produced; for the Art Theatre's backers wished to be recognized as patrons of worthy dramatic art, whether native or foreign.

Some half-dozen years before the outbreak of the world war the theatre, now a recognized world influence in the art of the drama, organized as a cooperative stock company, with a membership of one hundred players and students of acting and one hundred musicians and artisans of the theatre.

The policy of the theatre, at least in the past, has been to follow out a line of complete independence. It has truckled to no one, and yet has made good financially.

Before the war and its results rendered what happens in Russia a sealed book to the world the Art Theatre was covering yearly expenses approximating four hundred thousand dollars, and paying out something like a tenth of that sum to its shareholders: all of the profession.

During these good times it was a usual happening for the house to be sold out nightly, without any resort to sensational advertising.

In spite of the amazing Russian facility in mastering foreign languages, and the old custom of using the French language in the homes of the upper classes, linguistic experts pronounce the Russian tongue to be most rich and expressive and sonorous and beautiful to the ear. Indeed, such a conclusion was occasion for remark here in San Francisco when we heard the Russian speech during occasional intervals of dialogue in some of the operas sung by the Russian Grand Opera Company during its engagement at the Columbia last year. Therefore, when the American public views the choicest fruits of Russian dramatic art it will have its ears gratified by speech that is mellifluous and musically soothing.

Geraldine Farrar Coming.

Miss Geraldine Farrar has been secured by Manager Frank W. Healy to open San Francisco's 1922-23 music season with a concert at the new Schubert-Curran Theatre on Sunday afternoon, October 9th. She will travel from point to point in her private railroad car, and is absenting herself from the Metropolitan the entire coming season, so that hundreds of American cities that now know Miss Farrar only through the medium of the phonograph will hear her in person.

Manager Healy, in addition to the San Francisco concert, has booked Miss Farrar for concerts at Fresno in the Municipal Auditorium, in Oakland at the Auditorium Theatre, and in Sacramento at the State Armory.

VANITY FAIR.

We were discussing names. Old dusters who go poking through Domesday Book and the Patent Rolls and the Pipe Rolls and the Charter Rolls tell us some curious things about the corruption of cognomens—what Weekley calls the wear and tear on them as they descend the ringing grooves of time. So we learn that aristocratic Seven Oaks gets down to the rather meaningless sound Snook; and the thunderous, majestic Theobald is reduced by illiterate repetitions to Thibaut, and Tibbetts and finally Tibbs, than which it can go no lower. They tell us that names are the oldest articulated forms of speech—in other words, when people began to talk the first thing they did was to call one another names. It is not unlikely. There are still times and junctures when it is the only relief. But why cultured Britishers who can read and write, and know how printed words look, will persist in calling Cholmondeley Chumley, and in speaking of Worcestershire sauce in a manner to make children think it is made of worsted is still a mystery. Perhaps because it just "comes easy." That would be a reason; of a sort. But how in the world did they ever get York from Eboracum, and whisky from usquebaugh? Such corruption helps a little, however, by adding to the short supply. If duplication such as occurs in the sad case of James E. Power, Johnsonian postmaster, and James E. Power, manager of a Moore club, grows much worse we may expect that one morning some of those busy individuals who try to have everything regulated by law will initiate a constitutional amendment providing for a Department of Names, with experts and inspectors and commissioners to go about changing families' cognomens as the official number changes your house number after you have had the same one for twenty years, and supplying human beings with labels like Pullman cars. It has been done. The assigning of surnames to certain persons theretofore without them, Mark Twain tells us, was once made a perquisite of the army officers in Austria, and what they did to the newly-named was a-plenty; until the newly-named came in and bought the right, for a good stiff price, to select their own. And having paid the price, they selected the very best they could think of—such as Blumenschein, Edelstein, Rosenblatt, and the like; poetic and sweet in the German tongue. Such names would be worth a great deal, compared with some of our abrupt, harsh, monosyllabic English ones. Still, making new names is not a good fashion to start. In this age of general standardization, identities should be preserved somehow.

Many a business man grown weary with the thought of the great industrial strikes has said to himself: "Well, if they tie up the country so we can't do any work nor make a cent the links are always open, and we can do our little eighteen holes without those qualms of conscience that afflict us so when we have something else to do, and play instead." It has seemed like the glad prospect of enforced vacation, with the coal famine still afar off. But in Indiana they are finding out it is too good to be true. The caddies are striking at Vincennes and Lawrenceville, and it looks as if the thing would spread to other centres of the great golfing industry and finally affect the whole country. And will the government do anything about it? Will it take the view that golf is a necessity of life and appoint a commission to investigate the miseries of caddying and the fatigues incident upon a ten-hour day or a split trick? The caddies want 40 cents an hour instead of 25, and it is indeed hard to understand how a caddy can raise a family and enjoy any leisure for the improvement of his mind on 25 cents an hour. Certainly it can not be said to improve the caddy's mind to trail around carrying a set of clubs for the ordinary golfer, especially a very ordinary golfer whose game gets no better except when profanely stimulated. It is to be presumed that golf will soon take its place as one of the necessities of life. Well, it is—of a golfing life, which is the only sort some persons seem to understand, judging from the slant of their conversation. And isn't it wonderful what the Scotch sold us when they sold us golf?

In Great Britain the telephone system is operated by the government through the post-office, to the alternate exasperation and merriment of all the Americans who try to use it. For short distances, shouting seems more effective, and for longer ones there are convenient and cheap cabs. Getting a number is like waiting for money from home. It is a grand exemplification of government ownership such as the advocates of the Water and Power Amendment desire to see inaugurated in the field of power production in this state. Recently a government official received a letter reading: "The telephone for which I have been applying for over a year has now been installed. Please let me know by return mail on what day the Postmaster-General can come round and perform the unveiling ceremony."

Turkish women, like their Western sisters, find it advisable to aid nature with a little art, but the artist's materials are not produced in Turkey, and have to be imported according to a consular report. Perfumes, lipsticks, rouge, cold creams, and all the other items of make-up are in lively harem demand. And France controls the larger part of the business, with Germany perhaps a close second and the United States far back. The English supply the soaps. Before war, imports of eau de Cologne were heavy, but during the war a local industry arose and now Turkey makes much of its own supply. The trade in face powder is shared between France and Germany, France supplying the better grades, Germany the cheaper. All these things minister to the growth of monogamy, already so threatening to the old harem life. If harems are to become suddenly expensive through the unlimited use of perfumes and pigments, few will be the Turks that will care for large families. And when the harem life goes, Turkey will not be much more interesting than Alberta. So another great social movement may be traced to an economic origin and financial pressure. And from monogamy it will not prove a very long step these days to that freedom for women which appears to have been the especial aversion of the Mohammedan. These are times when it seems as if the world were growing monotonous.

Paris is becoming greatly agitated over its bathing facilities, and will probably become more so as consciousness of the present deficiency grows. There is a positive famine (if the negative can be positive) of bathtubs, in some quarters. A municipal councillor has stated that in the Epinettes quarter, for example, there are 60,000 persons and only forty tubs. He thinks that one bath for 1500 persons is not sufficient and that without doubt there are many inhabitants of this part of Paris who never bathe "unless they throw themselves into the Seine or pass the summer at some beach. Some do not wish to throw themselves into the Seine, and can not afford to pay for a season at Biarritz or Deauville. This is why the scent of our subways is not always so delicious." He says the same condition exists in all large French cities, and as to the small country towns he would not dare speak of them. And he calls for a minister audacious enough to stand on a platform of soap. When you think of standing on a platform of soap, audacity is hardly a strong enough word. The councillor is perhaps unduly anxious. Forty baths to 60,000 persons is about forty more than the Americans possessed at the time they won their independence and laid the foundations of this country. Our great national heroes, our demigods of the heroic age, were not much bothered with bathing unless they fell in the river. The practice of bathing was regarded as hazardous, and in Massachusetts they had a law against it except by prescription of a physician; which shows how sagacious it is to have things regulated by the infinite wisdom of politicians assembled in legislatures. The first bathtub in this country is said to have been put into a Cincinnati man's house in 1846. That was a long time for a nation to wait for a bath. Now we are enabled to spend thousands of dollars on tubs, showers, bidets, foot-baths, nickel-plated toothbrush holders, non-skidding soap dishes, instantaneous heaters and all the other paraphernalia which so delighted the Pittsburgh millionaire that he said he could hardly wait for Saturday night. If France will be patient, bathtubs will arrive. Let their production start on a large scale, well financed, and compulsory bath installation is almost certain to follow.

THE DOMESTIC CAT.

So long as the child's favorite pet is a kitten, and maiden ladies prefer the cat to the dog as a companion, the origin and family history of Felis domestica will be of interest, says the New York Times. In the Contemporary Review Aylmer Cecil Strong writes about "The Coming of the Cat." The coming of the dog would be a more difficult subject, for it is probable that as far back as the time when man could bring up and discipline a wolf's cub there were dogs. The Egyptians made much of cats, protected and worshiped them. But Herodotus says that Egyptian families went into mourning when a dog died. However, Mr. Strong says nothing about that. His subject is the cat. He is inclined to think that if the Egyptians had domesticated the mongoose, that animal would now be sitting on the hearth or sunning itself on the garden wall. He insists that the cat in ancient Egypt was really sacred, not nominally so. Diodorus is cited as an authority for the statement that cats dying in a military campaign were brought home for burial, although the soldiers might be on short rations, enduring frightful privations.

After the Romans conquered Egypt, they, with their usual sagacity, tolerated cat love or worship. Diodorus tells the story of a mob tearing a Roman soldier "to pieces" because he had accidentally slain a cat. An office of Keeper of Cats was hereditary. The Turks adopted Felis domestica. In Cairo homeless cats were fed by order of the Kadi. According to Lane, translator of the Arabian Nights, the Sultan Ez-Zahir Beybars founded a home for cats in a garden near his mosque. It must be admitted that in Constantinople the consideration for cats was not so tender.

There can be no doubt that the Egyptians were a persistent and patient people, for we should probably have no domestic cat today if they had not adopted Felis castra, the wild cat of the desert, and trained the progeny for generations. This appears to be settled, although there are scientists who point out that the color of the fur on the under surface of the wild cat's foot is yellow to the heel bone, while that of the domestic cat is generally black. There are said to be other differences of coloration, but who can believe that the domestic cat was always a tame, orderly, and discreet animal, clean in its habits, wise of aspect, and given to philosophical meditation? It is significant that the domestic cat mates with the wild cat in all countries, so that pedigree becomes a baffling problem.

In the township of Ludlow, Vermont, a woman used to exhibit two wildcat cubs, which she had brought up on the bottle. Her boy had discovered them in a hollow log in a mountain pasture before their eyes were open. They slept in her lap and submitted to fondling until they were as big as an Airedale dog, but eventually they died of civilization. Evidently the domestic cat was evolved only after a great many generations of intelligent and unremitting care. Mr. Strong finds that the domestic cat did not become a "familiar figure" in Europe until the first century of the Christian era. It was imported from Egypt. When the Romans finally evacuated Britain about A. D. 436 the family cat was performing its toilet on the doorstep. But it was 500 years later before the cat got into the statute book. In 936 Hywal Dda, Prince of South Wales, had a law enacted for the protection of cats. It seems that the Romans did not hold the animal in high esteem, for while "fragments of horses, dogs, and goats" have been found in the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum, remains of the cat were absent. . . .

Mr. Strong has collected some agreeable etymological data. For instance, the gipsies who came from Northwestern India and brought cats with them called the female pishika. "This form," we are told, "seems to tally with the Persian pushek or pusnak," hence puss, the term of endearment. The old Egyptian name for the cat was ma-u, "an obvious onomatopoeic." Apparently we owe the word cat to the Romans. They called the animal "catus," which meant the "knowing one," and the word passed into the Romance languages as chat and gato.

The Bolshevik government is said to have asked the Allies to pay them a war indemnity of £5,000,000,000. Lenin may be ill, but we are confident he is not suffering from nerve trouble.—Punch.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Booth, the tragedian (father of Edwin Booth), had a broken nose. A lady once remarked to him, "I like you acting, Mr. Booth, but to be frank with you, I can't quite get over your nose." "No wonder, madam," replied he. "The bridge is gone."

A British profiteer was bawling the heavy expense of keeping his son at college. His friend was sympathetic. "What is it that is so expensive?" he inquired; "board and lodging?" "No," replied the profiteer, "languages. Here is one item reads, 'For Scotch, £250.'"

One of General Pershing's favorite stories is of the volunteer battalion of backwoods-men who once joined General Grant. Grant admired their physique, but mistrusted their training. However, he told the "colonel" to drill his men for him. Without a moment's hesitation the colonel yelled to his command: "Boys, look wild thar! Make ready to thicken and fo' lef end-ways! Tote yer guns! Git!"

The late Henry Watterson, who was fond of sojourning at watering places like the Riviera, Florida, was one winter spending some time at Joseph Pulitzer's marble palace near Monte Carlo. He was sitting on the sun-drenched terrace when a group of gilt-haired old ladies passed. When they were safely out of hearing Mr. Watterson remarked, "Figures don't lie, but these new-fangled corsets keep them from telling the whole truth."

The British Weekly tells the following story of Lady Astor and her old negro nurse, whom she met again during her recent visit to America: "Lady Astor was showing Aunt Betty the picture of Cliveden, her beautiful home on the Thames, with its wonderful lawns and handsome house. Aunt Betty looked at the picture, looked at Lord Astor, looked at Lady Astor. Then she delivered herself as follows: 'Well, Miss Nancy, all I's got to say is dat you suttingly did over-marry yourself.'"

The editor of a magazine which is published by a New York bus company offers a prize each month for the best story turned in by an employee of the company on any topic pertaining to company affairs. Here is one which won this month: "One seat on the top and one inside," shouted a bus conductor at a stopping place. "Sure, now, and you wouldn't be after separatin' a daughter from her mother," said the elder of two women on the sidewalk. "Right ye are, I would not," said the conductor, starting the bus. "I did that once an' I've been regrettin' it ever since."

A Scotchman, an Irishman, and an Englishman were regaling each other with freak stories and washing them down with rounds of ale. The Englishman and the Irishman had paid several times, but still the Scot made no sign of cooperation. Still the stories went on. Said the Britisher, "The closest race I ever saw was won by a horse who had been stung by a wasp and won on the length of the bump raised by the sting." The Scot came him one better with a boat that had won by a new coat of paint. "The closest race I ever saw," said the Irishman, "are the Scotch."

In a certain rural village a man by the not uncommon name of Brown sustained the loss of his wife. A neighbor of the same rare name had recently lost a boat by theft and the vicar's wife, out to condole the bereaved Mr. Brown, called on the latter by mistake. She expressed her sorrow to hear of his great loss. "Oh, it aint much matter," was the reply, "she wasn't up to much." "Indeed," said the surprised woman. "Yes," he continued, "she was a rickety old thing. I offered her to my brother, but he wouldn't have her. I've had my eye on another for some time." Whereat the outraged woman fled.

A typical, spectacled, absent-minded savant from an Eastern university was a member of a geological survey outfit in Arizona. One morning he found that his watch was at a dead stop and would not respond to shaking, rapping gently on the tent pole or any other stimulus. It was a fine chronometer movement, and the party was dependent on it for some of its observations, so they sent the old professor and a keeper thirty miles by wagon to a little town where there was a watchmender. The watchmender screwed the usual little tail-light into his eye, gouged open the case, explored the works with his nut-pick, closed the case, twisted the stem and handed it back, remarking very gently: "That's a fine movement—one of the best I've seen. But you'll have to wind it."

Sir Henry Lucy, who publishes his diary from time to time in England, is just now being largely quoted for his "Later Entries." If all diarists were as entertaining as Sir Henry we could understand their vogue. Here is a story he attributes to Lord Beauchamp: "At dinner last night Lord Beauchamp told a story of colonial experience. It was illustrative of the primitive habits still prevalent in remote parts even of a colony so long established as New South Wales. An English couple traveling far afield came upon a residence where they were welcomed with colonial hospitality. Dusty and heated with a long drive, the lady timidly asked if there was such a thing to be had as a bath. 'Why, certainly,' said the hospitable housewife; 'come along.' The visitor was conducted to a shed, and duly provided with towels. 'It's a shower-bath, you know,' the hostess remarked as she left the place. Having prepared for the ablution, the lady looked all about for the string that in an ordinary bath would let fall the welcome shower. While still searching she heard, from what she discovered to be an aperture in the roof, an unmistakable male voice persuasively saying, 'Come a little nearer, ma'am, right under the hole, and I'll drop the bucket of water over you.'"

"Don't you think long hair makes a man look awfully intellectual?" "It depends. My wife found a long hair on my coat sleeve yesterday and I looked a perfect ass."—Canton Times.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Ballade Freudienne.

O do you dream of funny things at night—
Of purple dragons comin' through the rye?
Of scarlet fairies sailing on a kite
Across a dappled, heliotropic sky?
Of Pilsner beer or hops or pumpkin pie?
Of Yap or Vladivostok or of Nome?
Of vitamins or raging bacilli?
Have you a little complex in your dome?
When'er you slumber does a silver sprite,
Enceased in moonshine gleaned from fields on high,
Come wafting to your couch and halt her flight
To drop a kiss and, smiling, flutter by?
Is there a damsel for whom you sigh,
Another Venus risen from the foam?
Is there within your breast a stifled cry?
Have you a little complex in your dome?
How often do the clouds enshroud the light!
The hopes that blossom, wilt soon and die;
Suppressed desires scratch and claw and bite;
They yelp like yapping curs that terrify.
Have you a psychic mote within your eye,
A skeleton that stalks about your home?
A Hidden Fear that smites you, hip and thigh?
Have you a little complex in your dome?

L'ENVOI.

Friend, you may contradict, dispute, deny,
Pooh-pooh from early morn until the gloam;
For ev'ry dream there is a What and Why.
Have you a little complex in your dome?
—Lester Markel in Judge.

The Duck-Billed Platypus.

A fine male specimen of the duck-billed platypus, the chief zoological treasure of Australia, has recently been added to the collection of rarities in the Bronx zoo, New York City, says the Washington Post. The platypus is one-third bird and two-thirds mammal; it has a bill like a duck and a long, furry tail.

While the Australian platypus is so rare as to engage new and special attention in this country, its prototype, the duck-billed platypus Americanus, has long commanded the interest of psycho-zoologists. The duck-billed platypus Americanus (male) is one-third a party man and two-thirds whatever happens to be the popular issue in the state of his habitat. Sometimes the fractional proportions noted are vice versa, so to speak, depending on just how popular the popular issue may be. The Australian platypus feeds on angleworms, very small shrimps, and wood-grubs, his diet and that on which the variety Americanus feeds being much the same, metaphorically speaking. The scarcity of wood-grubs has caused the Bronx zoo authorities to appeal to the public to aid in supplying them with sufficient to keep their pet alive. The refreshment dearth which the Americanus type most suffers he more frequently relieves by an appeal to his bootlegger.

Thousands will flock to see the Australian platypus, but no one would visit a zoo for the purpose of gazing on the platypus Americanus; there are too many of them at large.

Some years ago M. Maurice Maeterlinck was forbidden to smoke by his physician. The author of "Wisdom and Destiny" has, however, found a way out of the difficulty. He discovered that by filling his pipe as usual and placing it unlighted in his mouth, the required inspiration comes as formerly. An example of the influence of auto-suggestion in smoking.

The Late Colonel Weinstock.

Harris Weinstock was born in London sixty-eight years ago and was brought by his parents to New York in early childhood. At the age of fifteen he came to California and very soon thereafter began in a very modest way at Sacramento a business career that soon made him one of the conspicuously successful merchants of the state—a position which he maintained continuously to his death on Monday of this week. Important as was Colonel Weinstock's career as a man of business, it became with process of time least among his distinctions. There was in him a profound humanitarian spirit. In the whole period of his California career—in his day of small things as well as in the period of his larger relationships—he gave freely of his time and his means to what we may call the broader human charities. To every cause and to every movement making appeal to generosity of mind and spirit Mr. Weinstock gave without stint. The main enthusiasm of his life, outside the ideal domestic circle of which he was the centre, was the betterment of his fellow-men. Never at any time did he fail to respond to any demand in the name of human brotherhood. Upon the basis of scant elementary schooling, Mr. Weinstock superimposed wide reading with the reflections of a thoughtful mind. He became a public speaker of grace and power. He was a prolific writer and gave to the world a series of studies of historic personages that became an inspiration to thousands. Some ten or twelve years ago he put aside measurably his business cares and took upon himself very considerable obligations of public service, mainly of the kind that yield no remuneration. He made a voluntary tour of the world, under commission from the governor of California, studying labor conditions everywhere, and embodying his observations and reflections in an official report which may be found in the library of every student of labor questions. He made careful study of the physical needs of the California community and in a period of official service as state market director contributed notably to the material welfare of the state. Concurrently with these activities and through many years Mr. Weinstock made contribution to the intellectual life of the state as a lecturer and as a writer for the newspaper press, mainly upon topics of humanitarian interest. Truly a man of fine spirit, a man of vital beneficence, a man worthy of the widest respect and of the affection that attended his life was Harris Weinstock.

The Columbia Theatre.

Richard Bennett, who has not appeared here in a number of seasons, will be the stellar light at the Columbia Theatre, commencing Monday night, August 28th. Since his last appearance here this star has been the centre of attraction in a number of notable productions in the East and last year proved one of the outstanding hits in the new play called "He Who Gets Slapped."

Under the combined direction of Thomas Wilkes and Sam H. Harris of New York, Bennett will make his appearance in the title rôle of the newly-staged drama, "The Fool," written expressly for him by the prolific playwright, Channing Pollock. The engagement at the Columbia Theatre will be the only one played hereabouts by Bennett, as he is scheduled for an immediate New York appearance in this piece.

Briefly told, the story of the play concerns a young rector, Daniel Gilchrist, who is compelled to resign by his fashionable congregation because of his radical sermons and his "fanatical" methods of living in accordance with the teachings supposed to come from the pulpit. His decision to follow the path he preaches causes his fiancée to break their engagement. He assumes the position of arbiter between a mining company and the workers whose cause he champions. He is misunderstood by both sides and is called a "fool." Finally he establishes a resort for down-and-outers, and this action brings him into a series of rather unlooked-for complications. How he continues to lose the world but to save souls is shown through the action of the closing scenes. Over thirty players support Bennett in this production.

The Orpheum Next Week.

The Orpheum, starting Sunday matinée, August 27th, is headlined by Haru Onuki, Max Fisher, and Florence Roberts. Haru Onuki is a Japanese prima donna of some distinction whose beautiful soprano voice was trained in America. Her repertory consists principally of singing songs, some of which are Japanese numbers and others American numbers sung in Japanese.

Max Fisher and his dance orchestra are known all over the world, and especially in New York, where they played on the Ziegfeld Roof. Mr. Fisher and Earl Burnett, the piano accompanist, have composed many songs, among which are "Leave Me with a Smile" and "You Won't Be Sorry." They will play these numbers and more as few synopated orchestras can.

Florence Roberts, the famous legitimate actress, and Mr. Fredrik Vogeding of the Royal Theatre, Amsterdam, Holland, have a brilliant farce entitled "The True Story," written by Lea D. Freeman, a Yale graduate. Fredrik Vogeding is a young Dutch actor who has played in many languages, but this is his first play in English. His accent gives a fascinating touch to his delightful performance.

Hurst and O'Donnell are "nut" comedians guaranteed to chase away the blues.

George Yeoman is also a "blues" chaser.

Johnny Singer and his Dancing Dolls have a unique turn.

Lew Dockstader in "Talking Through His Hat" remains for a second week.

"The Rivals."

The production of "The Rivals" at the Players Theatre opening next Monday evening as the second offering of the Vaughan-Rainey season should be something of an event. A distinguished cast has been organized to enact this diverting and famous old comedy.

Heading the cast is Evelyn Vaughan as the romantic young hoyden, Lydia Languish, and William S. Rainey as the dissembling Jack Absolute. Emelie Melville is cast for the loquacious Mrs. Malaprop. This is one of her most famous rôles and one which she played with Nat C. Goodwin and William H. Crane. Ann O'Day, well known here as leading woman of the Maitland Playhouse, will essay Lucy, the calculating maid in the Malaprop household. Frank Keenan Wallace has been added to the cast to play Sir Lucius O'Trigger. The choleric Sir Anthony is in the hands of Reginald Travers, and Frederick McNulty will play Jefferson's famous rôle of Bob Acres. Joseph Carson Sturgis is the Faulkland; Léon Bowen, Fag; and Louis Wood White, David.

"The Rivals" will be presented all next week, with matinées on Tuesday and Saturday.

The San Francisco Stage Guild has secured for its opening company the services of Maurice Brown and his wife, Ellen von Volkenburg, well known for the excellence of their work in the Chicago Little Theatre. Mr. Brown has had valuable experience as a member of Margaret Anglin's New York company, and has also done some producing in New York. He has also shown great gifts as a teacher of dramatic art and will be the director of the school connected with the San Francisco Stage Guild. Ellen von Volkenburg has specialized in work on marionette theatres, several of which she developed in the East. She will continue work in this line, and will also act and teach in the school. Sam Hume, who has just returned from a six weeks' teaching and producing course at the Connish School in Seattle, will be glad to meet any one interested in the work of the guild or the school Sunday after 10:30 a. m. in the Plaza Theatre, 80 McAllister Street.

Events at Paul Elder's.

The fall season of events in the Paul Elder Gallery will open Saturday afternoon, September 2d, at 2:30 o'clock, with an illustrated lecture entitled "Through Unknown Australia," by Captain Kilroy Harris, D. S. O., in which a series of unusual slides dealing with the lesser known parts of the island-continent will be shown. Captain Harris, who was wounded four times during the world war and later served as king's messenger and official war lecturer for the British and United States governments, has traveled over 5000 miles on horseback and over 5000 miles in a one-horse sulky through the back-country of Australia, and tells in his lecture of his experiences off the beaten path.

The Paul Elder Gallery lecture calendar for the fall season, setting forth the many events that have been arranged to follow this lecture by Captain Harris, may be had by writing to or calling at the gallery.

The Protean Element.

Sulphur is one of the most peculiar substances known. It can exist in different forms and still be one and the same substance. It is the Jekyll and Hyde of the elements. In outward appearance each one of the several varieties of sulphur is different from the other, but in essential properties it is still sulphur. In one form it is yellow, hard, and brittle. This is the most common form of sulphur. Molten sulphur, poured into cold water, solidifies into a stringy, plastic mass, amber in color and capable of being molded between the fingers. Its original brittleness is lost and it resembles a string of rubber. Flowers of sulphur, another variety, is almost white in color. Yellow sulphur smells on heating, but if the heating is continued and the temperature increased the molten mass hardens and becomes solid, melts again, and is finally converted into a gas. This peculiar behavior of sulphur is of the greatest significance from an industrial and technical standpoint. It has made it possible to mine it under the most unusual circumstances, a feat which would, under other conditions, have been impossible.

Pierpont Morgan has given a copy of the portrait of Milton by Janssen to Christ's College, Cambridge, where the poet was educated. The father of Milton, the scrivener of Bread Street, brought up his son with great care, and when the son was ten caused a young artist, born in England of Dutch descent, but trained, no doubt, in Holland, to produce a picture of "the little Puritan with auburn hair" clad in his neat lace frill and tight black-braided dress.

At Del Monte.

The summer polo tournament opened at Del Monte last week-end and continues this Saturday and Sunday. The San Mateo team is made up of Thomas Driscoll, Willie Tevis, Louis Carpenter, and Captain McCauley, and the Del Monte team consists of Willie Crocker, D. Schwerin, Harry Hunt, Hugh Drury, Eric Pedley, and Sam Morse.

The manoeuvres, drills, and parades at the United States Reserve Officers' Training Camp on a knoll overlooking the polo fields are one of the attractions of the week.

Another attraction at Del Monte is the presence of a moving-picture company which is taking scenes on the Monterey Peninsula for "Ching Chong China." Marguerite de la Motte, Harrison Ford, and Lon Chaney are the movie stars in the company.

Miss Evelyn Barron and her brother, Mr. Edward F. Barron, with his children, are at Del Monte to make an extended stay.

Mrs. John Emmert and daughter, Miss Barbara Emmert, of San Francisco, are back at Del Monte for another visit. They will be joined shortly by Mr. Emmert. The Emmerts have a homesite at Pebble Beach and intend making their residence in the near future.

Among those from San Francisco and vicinity who spent the week-end at Del Monte were Miss Helen O'Brien, Mrs. Charles Butters, Mrs. W. P. Hannon, Mr. and Mrs. John Lyar, Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Norcross, Mr. and Mrs. Ed M. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Clem W. Rogers, and Mr. John Parrott.

Among the guests at Del Monte Lodge are Mr. Miles A. Goodyear of San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Guthrie and Miss Marian Williard of Santa Barbara.

All main auto roads lead directly to the Hotel Oakland where life is "really living" and comfort supreme.

Colonial Finance In Africa.

War-burdened Europe is not the only part of the world where public finance and private business are plunged into confusion by a disordered currency, says the Living Age. Great Britain's Kenya Colony in East Africa is a case in point. The original coin in circulation there was the Indian rupee, worth slightly over 30 cents in American money. During the war this coin rose to double its usual value as measured in British currency. Finally, the colonial office stabilized the rupee at 2 shillings, as compared with 1 shilling 4 pence before the war. This added 50 per cent. to the local cost of production, and an equal amount to the old rupee debts, thus crippling colonial producers.

The next step of the government was to abolish the rupee as legal tender and to substitute a 2-shilling piece in its place, issuing paper bills of the latter denomination and a smaller quantity of coins of baser metal in exchange for silver rupees. This aroused so much popular protest that a new coin, the "Kenya Shilling," was finally substituted. The result of these rapid and inconsistent changes is monetary chaos.

Simultaneously, the colonists are up in arms against an income tax recently imposed by the government, which they refuse to pay on the ground that it is illegal. It is interesting to note that the nonpayers justify their opposition by the argument used by the American colonists, at the time of the revolution, that "taxation without representation is illegal." Lawyers are defending people in the courts for nonpayment of these taxes, without charging a fee for their services.

Dramatic Insects.

Soon after the successful filming of Maurice Maeterlinck's beautiful and impressive play, "The Blue Bird," the story went that he was commissioned to write a special scenario for the movies, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger. He completed his script and gave it to the head of the producing organization. The latter looked it over and then, with a gesture of despair, remarked: "Good gracious" (or the Hollywood equivalent of that expression), "the hero's a bee!" It may have been possible that the great Belgian

You wouldn't dream of leaving large sums of money in your home or office day after day and night after night.

Yet you leave valuable treasures there—heirlooms, jewelry, keepsakes—which money could never replace; you leave important papers there—insurance policies, securities, receipts—the loss of which would cost you large sums of money.

Did it ever occur to you that there is absolutely no safety for your valuables in your home or office?

You do not need to be reminded of fire dangers and the uncertainty and havoc of them, but you may not realize what an intricate, scientific, almost infallible profession burglary is! Home and office locks and safes are slight obstacles in the way of a professional thief.

Your turn may not have come yet, but that does not mean that it never will.

But it never will if you take the proper precautions. Don't trust the home hiding places—a joke to thieves.

THE CROCKER SAFE DEPOSIT VAULTS have been built to defeat the professional burglar and safecracker, and to safeguard against earthquake and fire.

The boxes are large and conveniently arranged, and the key on your chain is the only one that unlocks your box. You are assured of absolute privacy, and, for about one cent a day, you are assured also of perfect protection.

When you are in this vicinity again, give us the pleasure of showing you through these splendid vaults.

mystic, feeling original inspiration at a low ebb, was cribbing from one of his own prior works dealing with apiany life.

Perhaps taking pattern by Maeterlinck's own blue-bird philosophy, with its inclusion of the souls of presumably inanimate objects, or perhaps Rostand's "Chantecler," with its barnyard denizens, two Czech playwrights recently made a production at the Prague National Theatre in which all the characters were insects. Cable descriptions of this fantastic work describe it as being most pessimistic. There is a poignant tragedy in the life of each smaller bug when it is devoured by a bigger bug, though doubtless the authors have logic and science on their side. They even may be utilizing insects as symbols of humanity. "All symbols," Maeterlinck himself has said, "are symbols of something, and not of nothing," which, one is inclined to think, is itself a symbolical sentence. "Symbols," as one of the Belgian's witty commentators once said, "make such strange sounds." The late Henri Fabre, a Frenchman, probably knew more about insect life and its analogies to human existence than any of his contemporaries; and he has justified the Czech authors in many pages of his fascinating volumes.

The dramatization of the speechless is no new thing. There was, for instance, Aristophanes in "The Birds," with its "Cloud-Cuckoo-Town," and "The Frogs," with its lament for the decay of tragic art, one of the earliest dramatic instances of a longing for a return of the "good old days." One almost can hear old Aristophanes saying: "There were men who could write tragedies when I was a boy." Rostand's poultry yard was revealed and animated for us by Maude Adams, the most feminine rooster ever to greet the rising sun, while Wagner devotees long have been familiar with the bass, depressing protests of Fafner and the soprano warblings of the bird who led Siegfried to the side of the dormant, flame-encircled Brunnhilda. One wonders, however, whether all the juxtapositions of just plain men and women in their various relationships have been exhausted for dramatic purposes.

Another Peninsula Highway.

Whatever within reason aids the circulation of traffic it is good public policy to promote. Whatever enables people to travel about and see more of one another and the country in which they live assists in the broadening of intelligence, of public sympathy, of the general understanding of the needs of neighborhoods and sections, while it strongly militates against narrowness and against sectionalism itself. Both the intelligence of the people and the military strength of a state are enhanced by means of communication; and economically, roads are a great gain, for their tendency is to bring people and goods together and thus they contribute to ultimate values. Roads cost money, but they are better worth it than most of the things for which the public funds are spent. We can hardly have too many of them—at any rate we are in no present danger of having too many of them. And since the development of individual transportation by means of the automobile, California's highways constitute one of the principle charms of the state. It is true that our bond issues for them amount now to $73,000,000, and that the debt is likely to grow even greater before it begins to diminish. Yet solid value is there, and we have for the money a great attraction we did not have before. In the light of this development, it is well for this city that action has at last been taken toward providing another and seriously needed traffic artery down the peninsula, and across the Bay by means of a bridge either at Ravenswood or at Dumbarton Point. The San Francisco-San Mateo highway commissioners have decided to go ahead with the business. Supervisor McLeran, chairman of the finance committee, says the contribution of this city can be raised without increasing the tax rate, a bit of white magic one wishes could be extended indefinitely, and the San Mateo representatives are ready to do their duty in the matter. It will cost about $50,000 for a survey, and $175,000 for right-of-way purchases. The state may be induced, without flagrant injustice, to stand half the bridge cost, which may be somewhere between $2,700,000 and $3,000,000, the balance being assessed against a benefited district. The execution of the whole plan is expected to cost about $7,000,000, and as no such expectations are ever disappointed we may be sure it will cost at least that much. But the money will not have to be paid all at once, and the improvement will be worth it.

Tuesday's Primary Election.

The nomination of Richardson (Republican) for the governorship, seemingly an assurance as we write on Wednesday, is a mark of resentment and revolt. The taxpayers of California are weary to disgust of the carnival of extravagance that in recent years has gorged the roster of state employees, multiplied costs in every department of the state government, and trebled or quadrupled tax rates. Richardson promised curtailment of the official list, elimination of waste, and reduction of the tax bill; and the voters of the state, having observed his record in the state printing office and later in the treasurership, believed him and gave him their suffrages. Of Mr. Richardson's election in November there is not a reasonable doubt. In addition to presumptions based upon the fact that the Republican party is largely in the majority in California there is now in the nominee's favor the important element of individual prestige won on Tuesday. The Argonaut knows Richardson well and it has faith in his sincerity and in his administrative capabilities. There is not much flagree work about Richardson. He is a plain man well endowed with common sense—the rarest kind of sense—and he knows the job before him in all its angles. That he will justify the confidence of the electorate we have no doubt.

The nomination of Senator Johnson was a foregone conclusion. All the practical prognostics were favorable to his candidacy despite the many sound contrary considerations. The candidacy of Mr. Moore came too late and there was lacking the support of effective organization. It was the familiar case of raw militia against regular forces—and we have the familiar result. Mr. Johnson, we have no doubt, will be successful in November. But he has had a jolt—one that in spite of his majority vote will shake his prestige. His primary campaign, albeit he has won it, was no walkover. It has made clear the fact that a very large proportion of the people of California are distrustful of the man, resentful of his attitude toward the Harding administration, disgusted with his affiliation with Hearst.

Now a word in the kindest spirit: Mr. Johnson is a man of many gifts. He has courage, popular powers of expression, prestige of a certain kind, a winning personality. He has practically seven more years of assured service in the Senate. In this period he will either establish himself as a worthy political figure or he will suffer decline and eclipse. Two courses are open to him. If he shall separate himself from the La Follette group of irreconcilables, if he shall give the support due from one who claims to be a Republican to the Harding administration, if he shall dissolve the association that affiliates him with Hearst—if he will do these things, Mr. Johnson can reestablish himself at home and make for himself character as a statesman. But if he shall fail to do these things, he will go down and further down to a status worse than political oblivion. In the circumstances of the contest just ended, winner though he be, there is for Mr. Johnson a handwriting on the wall that he may not disregard without hazard of his fortunes as a senator and as a man.

In the results of this primary election we have the beginnings of a new era in California politics. There are new tendencies in plain sight. There will be reorganization under new motives, new standards, new leadership—and all to the good.

To Combat the "Ism"-ites.

A Boston dispatch of August 19th reports the incorporation of a society, largely made up of members of the Massachusetts bar, "to oppose further Federal encroachment upon the reserved rights of the states." Another announced purpose is "to stop the growth of socialism." This is cheering. The good Lord knows that the country needs some sort of organized effort to counteract the innumerable movements tending more and more in the direction of bureaucracy. The present year has witnessed a dangerous growth in number and variety of movements tending to radicalism, socialism, and the several other "isms," particularly at the nation's capital.

Notably there is a tendency to bring these varied movements into coöperation. The various associations of militant suffragists representing the extreme feminist movement, associations formed to promote legislation in character similar to the recently enacted maternity bill, organizations advocating the creation of a Federal Department of Education—these and the large and growing bodies of pacifists, some of them actual defenders of bolshevism and communism, with the several farm organizations, are found curiously interlocked in their directorates and in their agencies of propaganda. The pacifist movement has given them a common ground. The argument is the simple one that if less money is spent for the national defense more money will be available for so-called public welfare work and the creation of more welfare bureaus. Moreover, advocates of the so-called welfare work naturally are emotional sentimentalists who can easily be led into the pacifist camp, where they rub elbows with reds of all tints and shades.

This consolidation of interests, more than anything else, is responsible for the dangerous and destructive cuts recently made in the army. Approximately forty-two per cent. of the strength of the army authorized in 1920 has been cut, thus reducing the military establishment to a figure far below the pre-war status. They have made impossible the carrying out of the policy declared in the National Defense Act of 1920 providing adequate professional military instruction for the two non-active elements of the new army and navy of the United States, namely, the national guard and the organized reserve, not to speak of the professional instruction supplied by the detail of regular commissioned and non-commissioned instructors to public schools and other educational institutions.

It is an interesting fact that many of the so-called public welfare organizations were put forward by the organized pacifists to conduct a lobbying campaign in favor of drastic reductions when the army and navy appropriation bills for the current year were under consideration in Congress. It is unfortunately true, under modern propaganda methods, that the great majority of the members of worthy and patriotic organizations of women—and of men as well—have no conception of what is being done by their promoters and leaders in urging or opposing the nation's protection, nor of the strange and startling associations into which these promoters and leaders are being brought at Washington.

Verily it is time that there should be organized opposition to this association of movements which is seeking to fasten upon the country a system embodying of socialism not far removed in their tendencies from rank bolshevism.

The Loss of Collins.

In the assassination of Michael Collins we have the perfected spectacle of one of the most sombre aspects of revolution—that phase in which it turns upon and rends itself. The French revolution exhibited it, and so did the Russian. When the hand of strong government is removed and the people divide into factions, it matters not whether those factions be animated by the purest devotion, or the spirit of selfish adventure, or the desire for revenge, the revolution is likely to begin destroying its children; destruction is so much easier than building, and it is so much easier to displace an old authority than to set up a new one. The assassination, following so closely on the death of Arthur Griffith, has an ominous look to any one sincerely desirous of peace in the Green Isle.

In addition to being commander-in-chief of the Free State army, Collins was finance minister in the Dail Eireann cabinet. Shortly before his death he had obtained a temporary injunction in New York restraining Eamonn de Valera or any of his agents from withdrawing funds that had been collected for the Irish Republican cause and deposited in New York banks. These funds, it is said, amount to about $2,300,000, a balance out of $5,000,000 collected in this country by "friends of Ireland." The money belongs to the Dail, but two of the trustees of the fund are De Valera and Stephen O'Mara. The Irish parliament has drawn upon the fund for its expenses. The suit has brought out the fact that there is no one in the United States just now who can speak authoritatively for the Irish republicans. In the suit Collins acted as minister of finance and a co-trustee of the funds, which the factionists some time ago agreed should not be used for factional purposes. Whether the assassination was based on Collins' act as finance minister, or was merely a deed of reprisal, is not at this time clear, and perhaps it does not matter in a practical sense. The pith and pity of the situation is that a patriot is dead, and that his death occurs at a time when he was needed most.

For Collins' reconstructive work was only beginning. He had the authority, the prestige, and the boldness of method which might have availed to bring order to his distracted country. With Griffith gone, there seems to be no other leader in just such a position. He had held true to the fundamental demand for Irish freedom, but he could also recognize when the fight was to all practical purposes won, and saw no sense in further sacrifice merely for a name, and perhaps for a degree of independence which under all the political and geographical circumstances would be an anomaly and an impossibility. Under the Free State treaty and the Free State condition, Ireland would have had substantial liberty, provided there could have been brought about that essential of liberty everywhere; namely, internal order. Collins seems to have possessed the statesman-like power of appraising practicalities and accepting facts to a greater degree than most of his idealistic compatriots, and it was a quality that made him invaluable in such a condition of instability and insane confusion as Ireland has been exhibiting of late. With it he possessed both dash and firmness, both energy and moderation, both vision and restraint, combined in proportions that seemed to make him the man for the crisis. He believed the treaty he had done so much to negotiate would bring order and prosperity to his people, and even cherished the theory that an Irish settlement might form the basis for an effective League of Nations.

Aside from a humanitarian standpoint, and the desire of this country to see peace on earth, the assassination of Collins postpones again the much-to-be-desired time when the Irish question will disappear from our domestic politics and our foreign policy. It has always been a disturbing and an uncertain element, and one upon which demagogues could depend for votes and power. As long as that element affected our elections we could not be sufficiently independent to consider our own higher interest. It has been especially detrimental in all considerations affecting our relations with Great Britain. We have not been able to consider those relations strictly on their merits as affecting the interests of the United States alone, but have been forced to consider what effect any proposed settlement might have on Irish-American sentiment. It is largely on this account that the hatreds of revolutionary times have been kept alive for a hundred and fifty years when a better understanding and closer relations might have served to maintain the peace of the world. There was ground for hope that if Ireland could be content this feeling would be allayed and would rapidly die, and of late that hope has had a good part of its basis in the character and influence of Collins. Such being the case, he is a loss to this country as well as to Ireland.

Relieving the Strain.

European affairs have reached a curious impasse, from which ordinary processes of politics appear to offer no egress. They are log-jammed, hopelessly stalled, unless some outside power shall see its way to relieving the situation. The United States is that power, at least in part, and could, if public sentiment were properly informed, do much to get things going. To be of assistance, however, it is necessary for the people of this country to recognize two things: that their own prosperity is indissolubly connected with that of Europe, and that they must interest themselves henceforth in European conditions, for their own isolation has departed. It does not help, it merely makes things worse, for self-seeking politicians to preach the outworn doctrine of "no foreign entanglements," meaning thereby to the unconcerning voter the maintenance of our old aloofness.

The complaint is made, set going and repeated by anti-French propaganda, that France is by her own choice and evil disposition maintaining a huge standing army which has deprived her of industrial man-power and which demonstrates her inclination toward that militarism which has become anathema to good folk everywhere. The fault and the blame have been assessed to her, and the artifices of paid publicity are now employed to make Americans forget the merits of her case. But her great standing army is proof of none of the evil disposition with which she is charged. It is, in part, our fault. The plain truth is that France was promised protection in case she was wantonly attacked again as the Germans attacked her in 1914. That promise has not been fulfilled. Having no guarantees such as she was led to expect, she very sensibly determines to keep her own borders, even at great cost of man-power and of money. Meantime she receives no reparation payments from Germany, all the money Germany has paid so far hardly being sufficient to reimburse her for the upkeep of her troops on the Rhine. And meantime, also, the German mark, largely through the fiat money policy of the German socialistic government, takes a high dive after the Russian ruble and the Austrian crown, and for much the same reason, until last week you could have bought a hundred of them with one buffalo nickel. And meantime again, the rift grows between Poincaré, who refuses to abate the French demands for reparations, and present British policy.

The approaches of the Lloyd George government toward Germany and Russia, one the recurrent enemy and the other the one-time ally but now the potential foe of France as under her present dictators she is the potential foe of civilized society in general, constitute the sharpest point of tragedy in this tragic situation. But British policy is the outgrowth of British necessity. Economically, France is a self-contained unit. Her agriculture, her manufactures, her colonial outlets and her present foreign trade are fairly well adjusted to her needs. With England such is not the case. England, Scotland, and Wales have a population of almost 44,000,000, living on a territory capable of sustaining on an agricultural basis perhaps 16,000,000, probably at the outside 18,000,000. The rest must subsist on a huge export trade and its carriage. At the present time there are about 2,000,000 registered unemployed, which probably means a total of 3,000,000, and the taxation on every form of wealth is an almost intolerable burden. If unemployment in this country were in the same proportion as in England we should have about 7,500,000 persons out of work, and our present industrial troubles would seem a soothing and tranquilizing experience by comparison. In all probability we should not be supporting that burden with the fortitude and absence of popular turmoil which the disciplined British character and the homogeneous British populations are exhibiting. In respect only to Russia and Germany, the United Kingdom has suffered a large loss of market. In 1913 exports of British produce to Germany amounted in value to 40,677 thousand pounds sterling; in 1921 they amounted to 17,832. In 1913 similar exports to Russia amounted to 18,103 thousand pounds; by 1921 they had shrunk to 2173. To reduce these figures to dollars, multiply them by about  $4\frac{1}{2}$ . This is a serious loss of trade, and one which, in view of the necessities of British labor, is worth regaining if possible. Opportunist though he may be, Lloyd George has hardly any other course than to regain it if he can; but his efforts to regain it bring British necessity and British policy into conflict with French necessity and French policy, and that is tragedy real and actual, within the classic definition of the term. To help in any way toward a resolution of it would be a lofty mission, and one peculiarly within the province of American altruism; to say nothing of our own commercial interest in the general restoration of the world's economic health.

The debt owing the United States by our late associates in the war may perhaps, temporarily at least, be left out of the problem. We are not canceling it, but on the other hand we are not pressing for its payment. At some later time we might take up seriously the question of its refunding so that it should assume the aspect of a less immediate and harassing and discouraging liability. It has even been suggested that inasmuch as most of it accrued through the purchase of war materials and food for which the necessitous peoples of western Europe were charged from two to three times what the supplies were reasonably worth, it would be a graceful and a not altogether unjust act to scale it down. That may be left for future consideration. What the United States could do at present, and should do for our own sake as well as that of France in particular and Europe in general, would be to enter into a treaty with France and Great Britain assuming the obligation to go instantly to the assistance of France if she should be wantonly attacked again.

Far from being an entanglement in European wars, this would be the best assurance that there would not be another European war, at least for a long time to come. It would relieve the strained financial situation by releasing to industry the man-power France is compelled by existing circumstances to keep under arms. There is no doubt that the thrifty French would take advantage of such a chance. There is no militarism in France in any sense except a defensive and proper one. She would welcome the opportunity to demobilize her burdensome protective army, in order the better to mobilize a productive industrial one. Her main desire, like that of the people of this country, is to remain at peace and be let alone. But in such a world as we are living in at present the desire for peace is not sufficient. There must be a formidable potentiality behind it, to make a war of aggression look like the worst possible investment. That is what it would have looked like to Germany in 1914 if she had suspected England would come to the help of France, and the United States to the help of both. Had such a prospect existed in the German mind there would have been no war, and the world would have been a different and far happier place today.

Just now there is an undoubted war drift in European affairs. If a general European war should come again there is no way by which we could keep out of it. It would be a great deal better to prevent it by such a foreign policy as would show that we would participate if it came than to stand foolishly aloof and be again caught in a conflict we had done nothing to prevent.

Stick to Fundamentals.

President Harding has put aside proposals for government operation of railroad and coal properties—wisely, we think. There is a much better and simpler way to deal with the situation. Briefly stated, it is to let it alone. By letting alone, we do not mean that the Administration should leave the contending elements to fight out their differences in a physical sense. The duty of the government has been clearly stated by the President himself; it is to protect property and to protect men in the right to work. If this shall be done the pending troubles will not last long. Well meant as Mr. Harding's efforts have been in the past month, they have, we fear, tended less to compose the situation than to aggravate it. Railroad executives and coal operators have been stiffened in their attitude by hopes of government aid; likewise, the attitude of the strikers has been made stubborn under the notion that the government would in same way help them. The fundamental business of the government is to maintain order —to protect property and to protect men in their right to work. As the laws stand, this is as far as government has authority to go, and it is as far as it ought to go. Let the government stick to fundamentals—the safeguarding of property and protection of men in their right to work—and adjustment of the pending troubles will not long be delayed.

The Tariff Bill and Its Implications.

Since the far-away day of Alexander Hamilton we have had many tariff acts, some good, some bad, as related to the welfare of the country, but each in a manner more or less according to some declared principle or policy of revenue legislation. It has remained for the Congress now sitting at Washington to draft a tariff bill founded upon no principle, that reflects no policy, that is consistent with nothing—least of all with itself. For all its individual high rates, it is not a harmonious protective measure. For all its reductions and omissions, it is not a tariff-for-revenue measure. It is a hodgepodge—the outcome of a grab-bag scramble, with all rules of equity and consistency suspended, and minus any regulative and responsible authority. All previous tariff bills were made by a political party and in accordance with political convictions or policies. This has been made by “blocs” representative of special interests indifferent or ruthless as regards other interests, and so selfishly inspired as to have lost all sense of obligation to any principle or to any party.

The farm bloc has been the chief sinner in this reckless scramble. In the interest of the farmer—more specifically in selfish vote-getting interest—the farm bloc has dominated the hearings. It has applied the protective principle to those commodities that the farmer sells while concurrently applying the free trade principle to commodities that the farmer buys. Wherever the farm bloc could make an advantageous trade for votes—no matter what inconsistencies might be involved in the transaction—it has used its power without scruple. A typical instance is that of building materials. Lime, brick, shingles, lumber, magnesite, cement and like products, the domestic manufacturers of which are subject to keen competition from abroad, are denied adequate protection. In relation to this group of articles the farm bloc joined forces with a group of Eastern senators headed by Calder of New York “to protect the homebuilders” and to prevent the writing into the bill any tariff on building materials. “Who’s Who in America” for 1922-3 defines Senator Calder’s occupation as “engaged as builder, and erected nearly 3000 houses at Brooklyn.” Calder and his group are ardent protectionists where the products of their own states are concerned. They are equally ardent free traders in relation to anything touching their own pocket nerves.

With all its faults the bill which is now in conference is likely to become a law. Not that it is satisfactory to anybody or defensible upon any principle, but for the reason that it is the best that can be hoped for under the circumstances; and further because, with all its faults, it will substitute a basis for business calculation for the existing uncertainty. Nobody pretends to justify this bill, but it finds some support in the business world upon the theory that whatever its demerits something is better than nothing.

In this situation we have a striking illustration of what happens in our system when the basis of our politics shifts from the party principle to the rule of every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost. A high authority defines politics as “the administration of public affairs in the interest of peace, prosperity, and the safety of the state.” That is real politics; and it is a course only possible when members of Congress work under some sort of coöperative discipline. Without coöperation, only another name for party organization, and without responsibility, only another name for discipline, politics ceases to afford guarantees of any kind. Politics becomes an orderless go-as-you-please in which the interest of peace, prosperity, and the safety of the state are lost in the struggle for selfish benefits.

Today the most important concern of our real statesmen—and of thoughtful men in or out of public life—is how to get our politics back upon a responsible basis—upon the party basis. The alternatives are political chaos or autocracy. We don’t want either, but sooner or later we shall have first the one and then the other unless means shall be found to restore and revitalize the party system.

HEADWORK AND HOBBIES.

Gilbert K. Chesterton Enlivens the International Situation with Criticisms of American Success-Worship.

Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton is the leading paradoxer of the English-speaking nations. He has recently made a tour of this country and extracted from it a good deal of nutriment, and now sings his paradoxology. He has discovered that Americans are fond of success, and deplores the fact that this alien spirit is invading England. At the same time he makes it plain that Englishmen, too, like success, but the sort of success they like is not our sort. It is success in pursuing hobbies and light entertainment and thistledown trifles, and in bringing home, not the bacon, after the American fashion, but the missing handle that completes the tea-pot collection, or the cracked vase of the Ming dynasty without which the modern Englishman’s house and castle would be forever lacking. He declares that the other sort of success, the American sort, is quite alien, and that we are a foreign nation. To all which one is tempted to plead guilty in loud and positive tones, and ask how it happened that Mr. Chesterton, like the late Mr. Weller and the “vidders,” was compelled to undergo so much to learn so little; or why it was that he could not have used his considerable abilities to discover something the other transatlantic lecturers had overlooked.

For Mr. Chesterton is a person of ability and of undoubted distinction. An Englishman, he is a good Catholic; a Catholic, he is a Socialist. And he is a prolific producer of criticism on every mundane topic; criticism which he pours out with the prodigality of a mountain torrent, sparkling with wit, bubbling with good humor, and whirling into the most unexpected cross currents and back eddies of paradox. To be a Catholic when you are an Englishman would be somewhat of a distinction, although you would have considerable company. Real loneliness is attained, however, when you succeed in being an English Catholic and a Socialist at one and the same time. There may be other specimens, but the present writer has not the pleasure of their acquaintance, and supposes them to be few.

From this detached eminence Mr. Chesterton surveys a world that is all wrong, but past much helping, and so a fit object for japes. And very entertaining japes he pokes at it. To read much of G. K. C. is to behold the world inverted, as though you stood in Mme. Tausaud’s wax works and looked in a mirror that gave you back, not merely your own topsy-turvy reflection, but all society behind you standing on its myriad heads and smirking at you upside down, its upper teeth where its lowers ought to be; an amusing horror like Hallowe’en lanterns. You get such views of life as, that wrong is really right, that right is only wrong in disguise, that pain is pleasure, that the whiteness of black is only exceeded by the blackness of white. He can string them along that way, and string his readers along that way, until the end of the column. It is a gift, and a valuable one, for it is marketable, and is, in fact, Mr. Chesterton’s own method and material of success.

In the present instance, we have his observation that “there is something in the instinct for hobbies and holidays that is at once childlike and wise. We might almost say that the more a man has a single eye, the more he will lead a double life.” From this the discerning reader will see at once that the best illustration is a sample; and that applies to more than Chesterton. This paradoxicality appears to be one with the topsy-turveyism of Shaw, who is said to have derived the method from the much-discussed Samuel Butler; in fact, the story goes that Shaw once confessed it. Now Butler wrote “Erewhon,” one of those semi-sarcastic romances, in which with pleasant satire he pointed out that practically everything the typical Englishman does is a mistake. Butler’s method was the height of mechanical simplicity, and, once adopted, it almost enabled the book to write itself. The title is merely “Nowhere,” spelled backwards and with two letters transposed, which demonstrates the technique. The plan was to present everything hindside to, and upside down, and inside out, which can be depended upon to expose the seams and display without much effort the faulty construction of the universe. But it led Butler to one conclusion that is in general sound, for in “Erewhon” he tells us that a man who had made an income of 20,000 pounds a year was greatly respected, and even exempted from taxation, because it was assumed that he must have done something valuable in a public way or society would not permit him to have so much.

In the main, the apostle of inversions follows the model as long as the teaching is nonsense, but departs when soundness is approached. The American ideal which Chesterton reprehends “is that of what is called success; that is, the notion that there is something meritorious about working very hard for money, and the still more grotesque notion that there is something meritorious about getting it.” Had he really understood the society and the economics he professes to understand, and the service to humanity which all is said and done and all the exceptions are in, is the general condition of getting money, he would have seen more truth in the Erewhonian proposition than in his own.

Americans are rather fond of success, and that is well for America and has lately been well for the world. Dollars are a crude measure, we grant, but at least they are a measure, and in very many cases they are about the only one we have. The mistake Mr. Chesterton has derived from his brief but sharp pursuit of the dollars of this country is in supposing that Americans who pursue dollars are pursuing dollars only. Apparently he did not examine the conditions of the struggle, nor take into account the requirements of amassing money.

We carry in our economic system many parasites whose wealth was inherited, or acquired by marriage with wealthy widows, or derived from financial accident. Policy and the imperfection of human institutions makes that necessary. We have thus far discovered no way to avoid it; nor have the English. But one great difference between us is that in England such acquisition of wealth is regarded as success, whereas no healthy-minded American would see in it anything at all satisfying; so we have examples of rich men’s sons trying to be reporters, and rich men’s daughters trying to be nurses, in the laudable and pathetic effort to get somewhere and do something on their own hook. Such cases reflect with fidelity the American feeling that success is really achievement. That is something Mr. Chesterton apparently blinked in his rush for the box-office receipts.

We may justly regard mere parasitism as common to both countries, and cancel it from the equation. It amounts to little by comparison with the whole. What our critic means to accuse us of is avarice. Now the American struggle for success is not a struggle of avarice, but a struggle to do big things well. The difference is in the distinction between getting and doing. Americans who have made millions building railroads and developing iron mines and steel mills, until we have the world’s greatest transportation and steel-producing agencies, somehow do not seem content, after they have amassed their millions in that virile and publicly valuable manner, to go about collecting birds’ eggs, or pastels, or little cracked tea-cups. Perhaps they have a wholesome fear that their relatives would put them into nice asylums with spacious grounds where they could do their collecting under the eyes of guards, and with economy. It is true that the big-business-man class in America includes a number of crooks who ought to be in jail, and some of whom get there. It is also true that when our men of energy and ability become obsessed with the vision of achievement they are inclined to forget the niceties of life, or leave them to their wives and daughters; and also that they are likely to look at public affairs and the rights of others with a sort of mental strabismus induced by their peculiar obsession. But, granted all that, the business men of America have been the main factor in transforming a raw continent into the abode of a great civilization, for they have had the vision, and they have also had what is far more effective, the power to engage and direct technically-trained talent toward the solution of the hugest material problems.

Mr. Chesterton supposes that because our millionaires do not collect teacups, and butterflies, and paint china in their spare time, they are reluctant to use their brains. It is a curious deduction. He says: “There is one form of work which all these workers avoid at all costs; and that is the work which we call headwork.” If this critic supposes that George F. Baker does no headwork, how does he suppose the George F. Baker fortune is protected from the avarice of George F. Baker’s avaricious competitors? If Mr. Rockefeller did no headwork, how does Mr. Chesterton suppose we can buy good kerosene in this country at $1.15 a gallon or less? If he thinks young Mr. Grace of the Bethlehem Steel does no headwork, what does he suppose Mr. Schwab pays him his abundant salary for? Pick-and-shovel work? At pick-and-shovel work Mr. Grace could not earn three dollars a day; his hands are too soft and his back would ache. When Mr. Weyerhaeuser builds a new logging road into a forest, if he does no headwork how does it happen that the road gets built into the right forest, on the right grades, and at the right time to get us out the lumber? If a genius of vision and execution like Eugene de Saba does no headwork, how comes it that the reservoirs and the watersheds and the dam sites and the transmission lines are all so beautifully correlated for the delivery of energy for running pumps and cars and lights and machinery on our farms and in our cities?

Work such as this does not do itself. Nor is it done to order for men of money by ambitious young workers fresh from college or technical school, without careful check-up and confirmation. A man with a fortune to invest will either do more headwork to save it and make it productive than Mr. Chesterton ever thought of, or he will swiftly fall out of that class which Mr. Chesterton supposes does no headwork. The idle rich are few compared to the working rich. What would our critic call the decision of the United States Steel Corporation to advance the wages of laborers 20 per cent.? Does he suppose that decision was made with the gesture of a man detaching the ash from a cigarette? He may be sure it involved the most painful exploration of every circumstance bearing on the matter, a searching study of labor statistics, of production per man, of living conditions, of effect on the labor supply, of the probable future demand for steel, of all the thousand and one details of a vast and complicated industry, any or all of which were to be affected by the decision. If that does not involve headwork, then the judge on the bench does none.

Headwork? Why that is all Gary and Farrell and Schwab and Grace do. That is why we have steel. And that is what they are for in the economy of the nation—to supply us with steel, not to polish their culture collecting moths or postage stamps. If they wish to do such things in order to keep fit, that is a different matter. Some might. Harry Payne Whitney appears to take his recreation in improving the breed of horses, which amounts to something as a public benefaction, and other wealthy men find recreation in improving the breed of cattle, which, since the advent of the motor-car, is a still greater one. And if animal husbandry does not involve headwork in the superlative degree, then the agricultural colleges at Davis, California, and Ames, Iowa, and similar institutions ought to be abolished.

Unless we are much in error, the ideal of success which our rotund-otund philosopher so reprehends in America he will soon have to deal with in some form or another in England. Two great developments are going to bring it about. A few years before the war it was becoming evident to English manufacturers that the physical equipment of manufacturing England was growing old, and in need of replacement. Generally speaking, the "plant" was wearing out, or becoming inadequate in the modern world. New methods, new buildings, new machinery, and general standardization were needed. A great field was opening for the engineer and the capitalist together in the work of renewal. This work was halted by the war, and probably to a large extent remains to be done. It is undoubtedly being undertaken an item at a time, here and there, by separate individuals and corporations, imperceptibly to the mass, and gradually; but done it will have to be, and England will go through some such industrial evolution as America has been going through since colonial days.

It will be much assisted by the second of these developments, the revolution the war has caused in English social life—the destruction of aristocratic fortunes by war taxation, and the forcing of the most capable aristocracy in Europe into trade and industry. The English aristocrat will no longer be the dilettante whom Mr. Chesterton appears to admire. The war broke a lot of crockery and a lot of noblemen. The broken noblemen will have to cease collecting broken teacups and go to producing good ones. That will be better for everybody. They may even have to cease paying so much attention to the endless woman-hunt, and give more to the endless shilling-hunt, and that will be healthier. An old country can not be like a new one, but in the words of the "Belle of New York" it should be "as like it as it is able to be." The Americans have had a continent to subdue. They have subdued it. They have had a civilization to build. They have built it; not too well, but as well as any people could have done it. That has taken headwork. If Mr. Chesterton has not seen it performed, nor met in his recent lecture audiences the men who performed it, that does not prove that it has been "avoided at all costs." Whatever we have made by headwork far more than by handwork or backwork. Whatever England lacks today, generally speaking, she lacks because too much headwork has been diverted to the leisured Englishman's hobbies. Not that hobbies are a bad thing; but the Englishman seems to regard a hobby as a good in itself, whereas to the American the hobby as such can not rightly be regarded as more than a way of keeping fit for some serviceable activity.

MORTON TODD.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 30, 1922.

In granting an injunction to the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad against interference by striking shopmen "with the property, business, and employees of the company," Judge Edwin S. Thomas of the United States District Court at Norwalk, Connecticut, said: "These men assemble in groups and intimidate the workmen. This is an indication of cowardice. Peaceful persuasion is always permissible, but strikers or other persons have no right to intimidate by assault, nasty or vulgar language, or by insulting women, the wives of men who want to work. Any man has a right to go to work and the striker has a right to stay away if he feels like it. No one is forcing him to go to work."

The famous Dickens inn, "The Leather Bottle," in Cobham, Kent, where the novelist spent his honeymoon and where he wrote parts of the "Pickwick Papers," is advertised for sale.

If there is one thing in the world, says the Boston Transcript, that is nearer zero than the German mark it is the sorrow of the world at Germany's self-inflicted calamities.

Senator Henri de Jouvenel, chief editor of Le Matin, has been appointed French delegate to the League of Nations to succeed René Viviani, who has recently resigned.

A descendant of one of the most ancient Italian families, the Duchess Stella de Lante, has entered the American movie field. She has a part in "The Masquerader" with Guy Bates Post.

Miss Thelma Leonore Harrell of Savannah, Georgia, is the youngest Portia in the United States, probably anywhere. Miss Harrell, who is seventeen, was recently admitted to the bar in both state and Federal courts in Georgia, after studying law while yet in high school.

The people of Milan, where Pope Pius was archbishop before his election, have presented him with an automobile of the latest Italian model. It is mauve colored and bears the papal coat-of-arms on the doors, surmounted by the triple crown and the pontifical keys. The Pontiff, it is said, will use the car within the Vatican gardens. Cardinals of late years have been possessors of gas-propelled cars, but it is not strange Pius is the first Pope to own an automobile. Vatican officials have remarked the change from relatively recent time, when ecclesiastics were forbidden even to ride bicycles.

Claude West, the French impressionist and the last of his school, is to be given the signal honor of a national appropriation for a museum to house his works. The only parallel case is that of Rodin, and even in the case of the greatest of modern sculptors the Hotel de Biron was transformed into the Musée Rodin only after the sculptor's death. The French government, despite its straitened circumstances, has granted an appropriation of a million francs to convert the Orangerie of the Tuileries Gardens into an annex to the Luxembourg and a residence for a great Monet collection. Claude Monet has now reached the venerable age of eighty-two and is said to shake his head as regretfully over radical tendencies in modern art as his elder contemporaries did over the extreme radicalism introduced by Monet, Renoir, and other impressionists.

The new prime minister of Austria, and the first regulation premier since the revolution of 1919, is a priest, Dr. Ignatz Seipel. Dr. Seipel, who belongs to the old school of Austrian politics, first became eminent in state affairs in 1916 and '17, when he was a great favorite of the ex-Empress Zita. At that time, prior to the revolution, he was minister of education, a not unusual post for a papal prelate in Catholic countries. (The Hungarian minister for education is also a priest, Dr. Voss.) Dr. Seipel began life as a practicing priest in Vienna, became a professor of religion in Salzburg, and later a lecturer on theology in the University of Vienna. Then came his court connection, which ended with the fall of the monarchy under the socialist revolution in 1919. However, the same year he was elected to the National Assembly, where he became prominent as an opponent to the social democrats. Dr. Seipel soon became the leading spokesman for the Danubian Federation policy, which opposed union with Germany. With the fourth and final fall of the Schober government Dr. Seipel, as the leader of the opposition, almost automatically became premier. He is said to be the first priest to head a government since one was prime minister of Holland a hundred years ago.

A. S. M. Hutchinson, whose new novel, "This Freedom," is being awaited with considerable interest in this country, where his previous book, "If Winter Comes," is in its 377th thousand, owns to India as the place of his birth, in common with Thackeray and Rudyard Kipling. His father held the rank of general upon his retirement, and naturally he brought up young Arthur in the expectation of having him enter the military service in India. When the critical moment of exams came Hutchinson was turned down on account of defective eyesight. The parental resolution was nothing daunted, and the young man agreed with it to the extent of taking up the study of medicine so as to enter the army medical service. It was at about this time that the future author was inoculated with the literary germ, with such ultimately happy results, and A. S. M. Hutchinson, after a period of sending out manuscripts that were mostly unwanted, decided to quit a profession that did not attract him, and break into the newspaper game in London. He succeeded so well that at the outburst of the world war he was editor-in-chief of the London Daily Graphic, and the author of three excellent novels. Then he went to France, where, in spite of his conviction that he would never write another novel, the characters of "If Winter Comes" began to circulate in his busy brain, and shortly after he was demobilized the book was written. "This Freedom" is the result of two years' steady work.

Genevieve Ward, American tragedienne, recently died in England at the age of eighty-five. Miss Ward, who was born in New York, March 27, 1837, was the daughter of Colonel Samuel Ward and granddaughter of Gideon Lee, one time mayor of New York. She studied singing in Paris and in Italy and began her operatic career in 1856 in Milan, where her success as a singer was assured. Returning to America in 1862, she went to Cuba, where an unfortunate attack of diphtheria deprived her of her voice and brought her singing career to a premature close. In '73 she returned to England to act in Shakespearean repertoire. Her first appearance on the American dramatic stage was at Booth's Theatre, New York, 1878, in a play called "Jane Shore." In 1879 she opened the Lyceum Theatre in London, where she produced "Forget-Me-Not" and "L'Aventuriere." In 1881-82 she toured all of the English-speaking countries in her greatest success, "Forget-Me-Not," appearing some 2000 times. She is said to have remarked of the production, "In this play I gave Forbes-Robertson and Sir Herbert Tree their first real chance." Miss Ward had been unhappily married at the age of seventeen to Count Constantine de Guerbel of Russia, from whom she soon separated. She did not remarry. Miss Ward was an ardent sports-woman and an amateur artist. She wrote with Richard Whiteing "Before and Behind the Curtain." On her birthday last year King George conferred on her the Order of Dame Commander of the British Empire.

The Mahogany-Tree.

Christmas is here;
Winds whistle shrill,
Icy and chill,
Little care we;
Little we fear
Weather without,
Sheltered about
The mahogany-tree.

Once on the boughs
Birds of rare plumage
Sang, in its bloom;
Night-birds are we;
Here we carouse,
Singing, like them,
Perched round the stem
Of the jolly old tree.

Here let us sport,
Boys, as we sit,— Laughter and wit
Flashing so free.
Life is but short,—
When we are gone,
Let them sing on,
Round the old tree.

Evenings we knew,
Happy as this;
Faces we miss,
Pleasant to see.
Kind hearts and true,
Gentle and just,
Peace to your dust!
We sing round the tree.

Care, like a dun,
Lurks at the gate;
Let the dog wait;
Happy we'll be!
Drink, every one;
Pile up the coals;
Fill the red bowls,
Round the old tree!

Drain we the cup,—
Friend, art afraid?
Spirits are laid
In the Red Sea.
Mantle it up;
Empty it yet;
Let us forget,
Round the old tree!

Sorrows, begone!
Life and its ills,
Duns and their bills,
Bid we to flee.
Come with the dawn,
Blue-devil sprite;
Leave us tonight,
Round the old tree!

—William Makepeace Thackeray.

Jaffar.

Jaffar, the Barmecide, the good vizier,
The poor man's hope, the friend without a peer,
Jaffar was dead, slain by a doom unjust;
And guilty Haroun, sullen with mistrust
Of what the good, and e'en the bad, might say,
Ordained that no man living from that day
Should dare to speak his name on pain of death.
All Araby and Persia held their breath;

All but the brave Mondeer: he, proud to show
How far for love a grateful soul could go,
And facing death for very scorn and grief
(For his great heart wanted a great relief),
Stood forth in Bagdad daily, in the square
Where once had stood a happy house, and there
Harangued the tremblers at the scymitar
On all they owed to the divine Jaffar.

"Bring me this man," the caliph cried; the man
Was brought, was gazed upon. The mutes began To bind his arms. "Welcome, brave cords," cried he;
"From bonds far worse Jaffar delivered me;
From wants, from shames, from loveless household fears;
Made a man's eyes friends with delicious tears;
Restored me, loved me, put me on a par
With his great self. How can I pay Jaffar?"

Haroun, who felt that on a soul like this
The mightiest vengeance could but fall amiss,
Now deigned to smile, as one great lord of fate
Might smile upon another half as great.
He said, "Let worth grow frenzied if it will;
The caliph's judgment shall be master still.
Go, and since gifts so move thee, take this gem,
The richest in the Tartar's diadem,
And hold the giver as thou deemest fit!"
"Gifts!" cried the friend; he took, and holding it
High toward the heavens, as though to meet his star, Exclaimed, "This, too, I owe to thee, Jaffar!"

AN IMPERIAL BOGEY HUNT.

One More Political Critic Has a Case of Nerves About the British Empire.

When in our carefree youth we read the fancy—fantasy it seemed—of the British historian who, looking forward, saw a savage from some South Sea empire leaning on a crumbling portion of London Bridge and viewing, philosophically, the ruins of London, we thrilled with the dramatic possibilities of a distant future. Little did we wot that the war and its attendant evils would act as a fast motion camera in unrolling the scenes of any such future into the very present. Fortunately the savage and the fragmentary architecture are still safely lodged in the far beyond, which is their heritage. Or perhaps they were only historic license.

A critic who writes anonymously and whose publishers say he is a colonial with a distinguished British army record in France, Italy, Egypt, and Palestine, and who has spent much time studying the political status quo in England, has summed up the situation as he sees it in "England?", a book whose argument is that English and imperial leadership has passed out of the hands of Englishmen and that the cause of England's trouble was inherent in the nature of her imperial rise, the war of course being a powerful adjuvant. Like Lord Bryce, "an Overseas Englishman," as the author of "England?" anonymously signs himself, sees a parallel between the British and Roman empires:

The cause of the declension of Rome was the overlaying of the national by the imperial character. England, who has given so much, who has spent herself in the service of the world, is now destined to receive. And how many there are who are ready to assist the "weary Titan," to seat themselves in the seats of the mighty; to buy and break up the estates of the class which made England great, to relieve them of their books, pictures, and heirlooms, to transact their affairs, deck themselves with their titles, belong to their exclusive clubs—see them pressing forward to crush the Englishness out of social England. Forty pages each week in Country Life alone of announcements of ancestral mansions for sale.

England today is suffering from blood poisoning. The nation is not organically unsound. She is sick because she is not herself: there is far too great an infusion of foreign matter in her blood. She seeks seclusion, unity with herself. Beneath all the crudity and vulgarity, ugliness and unrest which disfigure London and the English towns, there is a soul in travail. It is, because of the very depth of its distress, strangely inarticulate. If it find expression, it is rarely in the public press, or in the utterances of the jaunty and successful politicians who alone seem to have the public ear; but you may catch notes of the national anguish in occasional speeches or letters to the Times of the responsible heads of the old English families. Or perhaps in the guardedly ironic deliverances of Dean Inge. Listen closer, and you may find that the heart-cry is not confined to the dukes faced with the necessity of quitting their ancestral palaces or the nobles horrified at Mr. Lloyd George's surrender to Ireland. You may surprise it in the decorous seclusion of the homes of the real English, who, in hall or hamlet, have somehow managed to keep themselves and their manners, and ideals—aye, and their sorrows, to themselves. They are not parading the sacrifice of their young manhood throughout Europe. Their one passionate desire is to be themselves—to be English.

One is reminded of Maurice Hewlett's claim in his recent "Wiltshire Essays" that the real hope of England lies with the English peasant—the backbone of the country. An Overseas Englishman allows the habitants of halls as well as hamlets in his eclectic group of the true English, but like Hewlett he would bar the superficial smart cosmopolite from the fold. The latter of course has assisted in English embarrassment:

Not only to rural England is the passing of the old families a great blow, because with all their laissez-faire and feudal pretensions they and their beautiful buildings and parks were an asset to the nation. They served to redress the balance between rural and urban life. The castle, hall, and manor were rallying places for the people of the countryside who will not be disposed to give to Sir Herbert Higgs or Sir Montagu Finkelstein the loyalty and personal affection they gave their predecessors. And it is just possible, as time goes on, that Higgs and Finkelstein will find that they have made a bad bargain—that the game of being country gentlemen is not worth the candle.

We piously hope so, but there have been other roots of trouble in England long before the war and its profiteers were dreamed of. Neither, in fact, were responsible for the unfitness of the recruits which the former called out. Of course that was after the destruction of the flower of English youth which the early days of the war so relentlessly demolished. But every nation has its unfit, and stature is a poor test of stability. Our gloomy author seems to enjoy such gloom as this:

The percentages of rejections for the army were alarming. In spite of the repeated lowerings of the standard of height and chest measurement, the cadres could not be filled with able-bodied recruits, until at last it seemed as if England was degenerating into what the prime minister called a "C3 population." The rejections per centum on a single day in Birmingham reached as high as seventy-three as compared with a maximum of nine for recruits at the French recruiting stations at Lyons or Bordeaux. But far better than a perusal of the evidence given in official reports and in the newspaper articles of the time was a personal inspection of the English conscripted regiments, not in battle, when their psychological state affected their bearing, but on the march, when they could be reviewed in the mass. The degeneration which had set in from the earlier armies, whether they were compared with the French, the Scotch, or the Irish, was painfully manifest. The superb first hundred thousand had perished, and the government was now drawing upon the masses—the general average of the nation.

The stature of the Guards had descended from five feet ten inches to five feet eight, then to five feet six inches. One regiment was composed of Englishmen scarce a man of whom stood over five feet. The elite, amounting to perhaps one-hundredth of the available male population, had disappeared, and the nation at large was now under arms in the field.

Our author seeks a broader cause for the prevalence of undersizedness and general mediocrity even in the later armies. The overseas Englishman seems to place at least some of the blame on the over-colonization that raged during the nineteenth century. The very force that was to make England an empire and that was to prevent the sun from setting on the Union Jack was, in this dreary view, eating into the native morale:

Whether it was in India, in North America, in Africa, the tragedy went on that was to form England's magnificent epic of overseas colonization. The world is apt to forget now the warnings that went up again and again to the youth of England: "It is not worth it." "Failure and death are certain." It seemed as if a demon of perversity had seized upon the soul of this island people. I need scarce burden these pages with instances. They began in 1609 and have continued to the present day. There is the tale of the Gold Coast—from which in 1871 even the hardy Dutch had retired forever. After the Ashanti war, Sir Henry Brackenbury solemnly adjured England to abandon the whole region.

Even so, inferior as the later armies were in measurement and general physique, they contrasted not unfavorably with the French. If the ratio of refusals at the same time was seventy-three English to about nine French, we can only conclude that the French requirements were laxer. Poor France! Perhaps she was not squeamish when numbers seemed the only thing that could save her from her mortal enemy. But though the following paragraph wrings one's heart with pity for the state of France, one is nevertheless relieved that English deterioration is not so great as the excerpt above on the Birmingham refusals would imply:

The Great War furnished to two countries—France and England—striking revelations of national misconceptions. The French, with a historic reputation for physical tenacity and spiritual buoyancy, sent legion after legion of corpulent fatalists into the field. I remember standing on a wayside hillock in Picardy noting for a living day the marching of infantry and cavalry, and the demeanor of the French troops. They passed in review like the legendary levies of the Covenanters. Sturdy, dour, silent, shambling—they would have justified the metaphor of the pacifist of "sheep being led to the slaughter." In another part of the countryside the English hosts came on—horse, foot, and artillery—slender, raw-boned, small, smiling men, vociferous in song. The comparison arose inevitably to the mind—of schoolboys and apprentices released from toil. Yet they were marching to the trenches. Such were the men whose bulk and phlegm had been for centuries contrasted with the dapper vivacity of their Gallic neighbors!

But all of this has nothing to do with political decline, which is the main thesis of an overseas Englishman's book. We have been delving beneath the political decline to its causes, of which colonization is so great a factor. And if the home-grown English troops suffered because of the colonization spirit of the last century the British army did not. An overseas Englishman admits with pride:

There was nothing more striking in the war than the fact that not one of the native races which had experienced German rule volunteered to fight for Germany, while there was not one race that had come under the even-handed justice of British rule which has not demanded with passionate loyalty to be led against the common enemy by English officers.

One of the great factors in the view expounded in our colonial's book is the agricultural and industrial situation. He points out that for the greater part of a century England had been a great wheat exporter, specifically between 1688 and 1760. And up to 1840 she could balance the increase of her population with an adequate increase in wheat. About 1840 to 1850 was the turning point:

In the middle of the century, when English agriculture reached its zenith, the relative yield of the soil was greater than that of any other country. England was the world's master farmer, and her methods were eagerly studied on the spot and adopted by foreigners. Today it is only in respect to the quality of her live-stock that she has anything to teach the foreign farmer. In the course of forty years or so, three and a half million acres have passed from arable to grass—and in spite of the enormous increase of the urban population, there are 250,000 fewer men on the land.

With a population of forty millions England only grows food for sixteen millions. She finds herself in the abject position of requiring the world to feed her in exchange for goods which other nations show an increasing disinclination to take on her own terms, and has thus created for herself a dangerous and precarious position.

And with the fall of national farming and the rise of manufacture the seeds of weakness were sown. With factories and their products came advertising. English taste and digestion would appear to be doomed, and with them culture in the aesthetic sense and the sound mind that inhabits a sound body. But we are outstripping the Colonial Britisher, who here chiefly laments the effect on journalism:

The Times, as every other journal, has to see its columns profaned and vulgarized by the intrusion of matter in the wrong place. If the aesthetic sense is not outraged by the juxtaposition of the pictorial announcement of some dress-maker or soap-boiler with the obituary notice of a statesman or an essay on Einstein, it is because of the hardening effect of custom. Posterity will regard this phenomenon with different eyes. It robs the journal of its dignity, of any pretense to literary unity. It is as if a malicious urchin were to scrawl a slang couplet across a dignified official proclamation. How can the mind retain its concentration and singleness, if it is asked at the same time and in adjoining columns suavely in the one and stridently in the other to consider the details of female underclothing and an exposition of the pragmatic philosophy of William James?

With the gradual relinquishment of the work best suited to the national genius, agriculture, came a deterioration in the native genius for work. They did not take kindly to factories, and perhaps it is at this very point that we tap a hidden cause of British trouble. Money accumulated too readily. Goldsmith's dirge rings portentously in one's head. Ill fares the land, indeed, where wealth accumulates and men decay. Today the idea of a Fijian on Brooklyn bridge sketching the ruins of New York's skyline is grotesque enough, but perhaps it is not amiss to bear the analogy in mind. We refer it at least to the thoughtful few who see the futility of wealth at all costs.

People need incentive to work. That is probably why history moves in cycles. At any rate the war proved an incentive, but alas, not a lasting one:

The decline in national industry was spectacularly arrested by the war, when the whole nation put its heart and soul into the work of achieving victory. For a space of four years it was again the old England. Work became an ecstasy; idleness a reproach. No task was too arduous or too humble not to attract swarms of votaries. The rewards were great, but more than money was a return of the old sense of accomplishment and the joy of emulation. Victory came; and almost immediately the English nation fell back into the evil ways, the miserable shirking, the distrust of capital, the foolish demands that an industry should pay them more than the industry was worth to those who initiated and organized it; and then, the criminal strikes, the menaces, and the feverish unrest, leading finally to such economic dislocation and unemployment on such a vast scale that two million idlers became pensioners on the bounty of the government. Then was the shameful spectacle seen of thousands of sturdy men and women refusing employment when it was offered, preferring to accept the dole of the richer and more industrious classes. No wonder that General Booth of the Salvation Army, who has spent his life amongst the industrial classes, should point out the grave consequences of this policy upon the character of the English workman.

Pausing for a moment in our frenzied search for symptoms and causes of the present embarrassment, we must remark that though that argument is the theme of "England?" it does not monopolize the attention of its author. A minor point for which he holds a brief is the misuse of the word British. We have been guilty of it several times in this review. "British," it seems, is a modern contraption devised to spare the feelings of the Scotch, Welsh, Colonials, and Irish. For some reason or other prior to imperial days the three former peoples were content to be called English. One wonders if the Irish were. Doubtless it was immaterial to the Scot what he was called since his nationality could never be hidden anyway and he probably thought he conferred an honor on that of England by answering to it. The overseas Englishman is a little hazy about it and its insidious danger, but there is no mistaking his feeling on the subject. He would like to reinstate the good old terms England and the English.

In a chapter on English character, in which the author shows considerable psychological acumen, he sums up his countrymen as follows:

If the English character in general can not be understood abroad, it is perhaps because it is not understood at home. The conduct and disposition of the English, their tastes and their prejudices, have been misconceived and misrepresented by their own social and political leaders. A Frenchman instinctively understands France; a German understands Germany; sometimes even an American statesman understands America; but British annals for the past century are full of examples of great men and great parties who failed to understand England.

If one does not possess the secret, what contradictions the English as a race present! One does not know where to have them. This observer says they are fundamentally sentimental; another that they have laughed their sentimentalists out of court. They are a great commercial country, and yet the least commercially-minded people on earth: a nation of shopkeepers, and a nation of idealists. They are proud, and yet what race shows such humility? They are not artistic or literary, and yet they have produced the greatest masterpiece of art and literature. No one calls the English witty, and yet their wit is perhaps greater in content than that of any other nation. They are proverbially lazy—yet by the sweat of their brow and the force of their muscle they have altered the face of the planet. Rigid and conservative, no people have run harder and longer after novelty. No wonder that the baffled foreigner fails to understand such inconsistency.

We have rather deliberately swung over to a contemplation of this lighter side of the book before quitting, to relieve the tension that one feels after a prolonged study of England's woes. It is not a pessimistic study. We feel that the overseas Englishman has not overstated the facts. He does not even state them bitterly. He merely records a crisis and his peroration is not unoptimistic:

But what power—what prophet is to awaken the sickly millions in England—to bring about a moral and hygienic revolution? What sudden and universal flash of insight is to come to the nation, revealing to the industrial masses that their whole organization and practice of daily life is wrong, that they can no longer with impunity herd in cities and take their daily bread from "vans and cans and chemical works," that dirt and disease destroy the body and addiction to cheap pleasures degrades the soul?

We have not hazarded a guess at the identity of an overseas Englishman, though we assume he is a Canadian. He is probably not a professional writer. His style has the inequality of one not used to this medium of expression and his argument, while it is all there and the sympathetic reader extracts it easily enough, is not presented as forcibly as it might be. However, it is a sincere little book, and if its form is not quite professional it is none the less vital and significant.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending August 26, 1922, were $135,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $112,000,000; an increase of $23,800,000.

Basic conditions have not changed during the last thirty days. The normal midsummer slackening in business has been less noticeable than usual, despite the fact that the railroad and coal strikes have continued to exert an adverse effect, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York.

Evidence of the steadiness with which all theless difficult to see how serious traffic congestion can be avoided.

Wholesale trade in most lines is satisfactory. It is apparent that retailers are continuing their policy of conservative orders, but reports from all parts of the country indicate that a good autumn business is expected. The most recent crop reports, together with the fact that aside from men out on strike, there are now fewer unemployed workers in the United States than at any time since the beginning of the business recession of 1920, amply justify this expectation.

The iron and steel industry is being increasingly affected by the difficulties arising from the coal and railroad strikes, but aside from the effects of the labor situation, the outlook for the industry on the basis of unfilled orders and other evidences of demand is for stable business to the close of the year. While no marked changes have occurred in conditions in the various divisions of the textile industry, there has been a gradual recovery in New England from strike conditions. A slightly improved demand for broad silks is in evidence. Operations in the boot and shoe industry and other sections of leather manufactures are expanding. The automobile and tire industries have not as yet shown as much seasonal curtailment as was expected. The machine tool industry is about holding even and a steady although restricted distribution of agricultural implements continues. Demand is fair and a reasonable activity prevails in many special lines, such as electrical apparatus, household utilities, and furniture.

Aside from temporary fluctuations, money rates have shown no change during the last thirty days and easy conditions prevail in all sections of the money market. Prime commercial paper rules at 4 to 4 1/4 per cent. There is only a very small amount of paper moving, and with a few exceptions buyers are disposed to insist on rates somewhat better than 4 per cent. Demand from country banks is especially poor, being even less than at the corresponding season a year ago. Banks in financial centres outside New York have been buying some paper, but most New York City banks have not been active purchasers.

Call money has fluctuated considerably from day to day without any marked general trend, and there has been no notable change in the volume of loans on stocks and bonds as reported to the Federal Reserve Board either by the banks of New York City or elsewhere. Renewal rate on August 15th was 3 1/2 per cent. Time money ruled at 4 per cent. for ninety days and 4 1/4 per cent. for four to six months.

The brokers' selling rate on prime sixty to ninety-day bankers' acceptances is 3 per cent., the rate being the same as thirty days ago. The volume of transactions is comparatively small.

The attitude of comparative indifference with which, until recently, the troubles in the coal fields have been viewed by California, while natural, even excusable, is lamentable. For all that concerns even one state is the concern of all, and happenings that represent calamity to a large number of our citizens can not wisely be ignored by any, says R. Berkeley of Strassburger & Co.

The effects on transportation and all the basic industries are now coming home to every Californian, touching each one of us as they do through their bearing on the cost of nearly everything we use.

Discussion of the viewpoints of the two parties to the struggle is as unwise as it is unnecessary. The issues lie deeper and any words tending to inflame passions can not fail to have serious consequences for all of classes of goods have been moving is the fact that carloadings for the month of July, exclusive of coal, were one-fourth greater than such loadings for July, 1921, and lacked very little of reaching the total for August, 1920, the highest recorded month for American railroads. Equally convincing evidence of the remarkable maintenance of business activity is the total of debits to individual accounts as reported by member banks to the Federal Reserve Board, which were 13 per cent.

higher for the week ending August 9, 1922, than for the corresponding week in 1921.

On the basis of freight movement thus far in 1922, an unprecedented strain on the capacity of the railroads seems certain in the autumn as a result of the expected expansion of business, the delayed movement of coal, and the marketing of large crops. The roads have ordered more than 100,000 cars during the year, and have steadily improved their facilities in other ways, but it is never-of the world are justified in using. What we can not afford has yet to be discovered. Certainly we can not afford to bear the blood-guilt of injustice to any of our citizens.

If under present conditions a reasonable return to capital investment is not assured, it will not be a question of our obligations to capital. Coal will in that case not be produced by individual effort. For investment can not be forced.

There is another alternative, government control. Alien to the spirit of American ideals, this can never be an attractive solution of the difficulties.

The way to permanent peace lies in the temporary shutting down of some of the mines, insuring to those who work the remainder a wage that provides for a good standard of living—such as every American has always expected and deserved—and a fair return to capital investment.

Our consequent obligation to the workers who may therefore be forced to seek other employment is one we should accept without murmuring.

The William R. Staats Company is offering $250,000 Planada Fruit Farms, Inc., first mortgage ten-year sinking fund 7 per cent. bonds, due November 1, 1932. Price 101 and interest, yielding about 6.85 per cent. These bonds are tax exempt in California and the company agrees to pay normal Federal income tax up to 2 per cent. The bonds are secured by 1924 acres of fertile fruit lands adjoining the town of Planada on the main line of the Santa Fé Railroad in Merced County. Approximately 894 acres of the land have been sold under contracts of sale for the face sum of $464,554, and $159,095 have been paid on such contracts, leaving a balance of $305,459 due by purchasers to the Planada Fruit Farms.

Something like 10,000,000 or more gross tons, out of a total of 62,000,000 total world tonnage, is now idle, or between 15 and 20 per cent., according to information gathered on the New York Herald's shipping page. The United States Shipping Board's idle fleet accounts for 4,625,000 of the idle tonnage. British shipping has been nearly as much affected as American. It is estimated that "1,900,000 tons of British shipping is eating its head off in idleness, or 10 per cent. of the total merchant marine of the kingdom." Further facts on the world situation are given: "Although the tonnage laid up is not generally the most efficient, the average value of the idle vessels is estimated at not less than $45 a gross ton. Thus the total capital involved the world over is in excess of $450,000,000. Based on costs of construction, the figure would be much higher, as much of the tonnage, especially that of the Shipping Board, was built after 1915 and at the peak of building costs."

In the interim between the spring rise and the expected fall boom the stock market has settled down to a rather meaningless series of trading sessions. Traders who ordinarily swing large-sized blocks of stock have, as a rule, taken profits on that portion of their holdings which would require constant watching and are holidaying at some distance from Wall Street. One of the largest operators recently sailed for Europe. If the market breaks, large-calibre operators will likely be buyers of stocks; or, if the market shows signs of forging ahead again, they will undoubtedly return to the street to take part in the next extensive movement, says J. G. Donley, Jr., in Forbes Magazine.

In other words, the stock market has been left to take care of itself, and, considering the occasionally alarming reports from the strike centres, the repeated disappointments over rumored early settlement of one or the other strike, the renewed collapse of the market, England's disturbing note to France on the question of inter-Allied debt settlements, and various other events calculated to restrain enthusiasm, it has performed very creditably. Average prices of industrial and railroad stocks, and the general average for the market have reached new high levels. In the meantime, the daily volume of trading has dropped from above a million shares to between 500,000 and 800,000.

If it were definitely known that either the coal strike or the railroad strike were destined to continue long enough to seriously retard the recovery in business, the market's movement would certainly be due for some reversal. But, although it can not be definitely affirmed that the strikes will not have serious results upon business, the average trader will not risk a short sale nor the loss of his position on the long side of what is now generally recognized as a major bull movement, in the face of the possibility of an overnight settlement of one or both of the labor disturbances. Other factors being bullish, Wall Street never takes the bear side on strikes, because, while no one can predict how long a strike will last, every one knows that it may be settled in the course of a ten-minute conference.

The greatest cause for concern about the current dealings lies in the fact that it is almost impossible to find a bear in Wall Street. Practically without exception everybody is bullish. Those who talk about the market in commission houses, writers of brokerage market letters, financial editors of New York and out-of-town papers, and important bankers, business men, economists, and speculators—all are bullish. Perhaps this unanimity of opinion, more than anticipation of the usual summer dullness, has induced several big traders to reduce their holdings and leave the market to its own devices. In their judgment it is a market in which to ride lightly and await developments, no matter how sure they may be that the longer trend will be upwards. Experience has taught them that bull markets are not immune from sudden, sharp reactions.

The best course for the ordinary trader would seem to be to follow this plan, taking profits on that part of his holdings that have had wide advances and being prepared to take on additional stocks in the event of either a reaction or a pronounced and unmistakable renewal of the main upward movement.

of their rise to date, the best group of stocks to hold is the rails. In this group, St. Paul common is showing signs of heavy accumulation, and it would not be surprising within the next two years to see this stock retrace the ground that it lost so swiftly in 1917, when it began its long decline from around the 90 level. Southern Railway is another low-priced issue that has been consistently accumulated and which, owing to the industrial and agricultural rehabilitation of the South on an inspiring scale, as recently told in Forbes by Editor Edmonds of the Manufacturers Record, holds the promise of considerably higher prices before the major bull movement has run its course. St. Louis & Southwestern common, with earnings of over $9 a share last year and the promise of $10 or $12 this year, is also worth buying and holding.

Other medium and low-priced rails that are sufficiently attractive to hold strongly to are Baltimore & Ohio, Kansas City Southern, Pere Marquette, Rock Island, and St. Louis-San Francisco.

The standard dividend-paying rails, responding to buying coming largely from far-sighted investors, have with fair regularity been moving into new high ground. In this group, Union Pacific, on account of its relatively high yield, is unusually attractive. Others that should be bought for a long pull are Atchison, Atlantic Coast Line, Illinois Central, Louisville & Nashville, New York Central, Norfolk & Western, and Southern Pacific.

Copper metal has held quite firm during the dull summer months, and while production is slowly increasing there is every indication that an improved demand in the fall will result in rising quotations. Stocks in this group that may be bought to hold for substantially higher prices include Anaconda, Chile, Cerro de Pasco, Kennecott, Inspiration, Miami, Ray, and Utah.

A further outbreak of the price war in the motor industry has caused some shading of prices in that group, but the shares of companies that are strongly situated and which will gain through the elimination of weaker units aimed at in the price-slashing campaign are very likely to recover sharply from their present reaction when the fall advance starts in the general market. The best judgment is that Studebaker is better to buy than to sell. Chandler Motors is apparently not accomplishing the sales or earnings records that were predicted earlier in the year. General Motors, on the other hand, is doing better than some of its friends predicted a few months ago. Maxwell Motors stocks have been badly managed in the market, although earnings have fully come up to forecasts, and it is to be expected that these stocks will sooner or later adequately discount the company's strong financial and revenue position.

Specialties that seem to have possibilities of further bulling in the next upward swing are National Lead, U. S. Realty & Improvement, Associated Dry Goods, Sears-Roebuck, Central Leather, American Hide & Leather, Goodrich Rubber, American Beet Sugar, Westinghouse Electric, Western Union, American Can, and Endicott-Johnson.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Several publishers have commented during the past year on the return of the historical novel. Probably there never has been a specific era of the historical novel, the nineteenth-century fad for them being rather a Scott rage. But the novel based on authentic facts is assuredly coming into its own as writers are more and more realizing that truth is stranger than fiction. It may be remarked that many of the greatest have capitalized the ready-made drama of history, but the significant thing about the new historical novel is that it does not merely borrow the panoply of history; it revokes the dead and awakens the past. That is to say, it does in a few brilliant examples, chief among which are the Baroness Aminoff's marvelous Napoleonic series. Nothing more formidable than an exhaustive study of Napoleon by the average historical novelist can be imagined. Treated by the majority of them it would be deadly. But if there ever has been a great historical novelist that person is Léonie Aminoff. Those who read "Revolution," the first of the Torchlight series, thought that her high level of achievement in what was then to be the first novel of a trilogy could not possibly last through the second and third volumes. We raved over "Revolution," but looked forward to its two sequels with fear and doubt. Now the second volume, "Love," has been published (E. P. Dutton & Co.: $2), and it seems that Mme. Aminoff has changed her plan and intends writing, not three Napoleonic books, but a dozen, and having read "Love," we are now qui vive for the remaining ten. We do not pretend to even know how she does it. She must have as a seventh sense Henry James' "sense of the past." History is more alive to her than the present is to most of us, but that is her secret.

The third volume of Professor Thomson's "The Outline of Science" (G. P. Putnam's Sons) has appeared rather shortly on the heels of the second. Volume 3 of this "plain story simply told" introduces the layman to psychic science, the new applied sciences of telegraphy, telephony, flying, and modern chemistry, biology, botany, meteorology, and so on. Those who had the foresight to subscribe for this set can flatter themselves on their perspicacity, and those who did not can be impatient trying to make good the deficit. It is certainly an invaluable reference work of popular science which all young people, in particular, should have access to. The work when complete in four volumes will aim to cover the field of modern scientific development, and Professor Thomson's efforts have been so successful and his accomplishment is at once so masterly and simple that it is well warranted to enlighten the unscientific and illuminate the initiate.

It is a day of dramatic as well as other unrest, many critics, including Maurice Baring, favoring a revival of the puppet show. In a recent review of the subject Mr. Baring commented on the superior lifelikeness of marionettes to ordinary actors, who conversely always suggest puppets. And a great American dramatic authority has expressed the opinion that all actors should be replaced by the wooden dolls and their guiding strings. Certainly the discriminating agree that Tony Sarg's marionette shows are superior, for instance, to the average stock company. In reality they are superior to any but the most finished acting, as they are artistic, and most dramatic performances are not. The talent is often there, but unlike Mr. Sarg's dolls, which can be made to do anything their stage manager wishes, the average actor is both untrained and unmanageable. A solution of the theatrical debacle might be found in a return to the classical tradition, not necessarily the Greek tradition. A picture of the typical commercial road show converted to the classical cause flits dizzily before one. But of course we are speaking abstractly and with reference to an ideal richer than the American dollar. The book that has suggested these fragmentary comments is a handsome volume by Kate Buss called "Studies in the Chinese Drama" (The Four Seas Company; $5). Miss Buss' scholarly representation of the cult of the drama in China has fired us with a great yearning for a similar Occidental institution. The ambition is probably a vain one. "Studies in the Chinese Drama" is nevertheless a beautiful contribution to dramatic literature. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

A number of monographs relating to the various bureaus and commissions of the United States government are being published for the Institute for Government Research by D. Appleton & Co. Five volumes have appeared recently and several more are to be issued. The titles of this week's publications are "The United States Bureau of Mines," "The Alaskan Engineering Commission," "The Federal Trade Commission," "The United States Tariff Commission," "The Federal Board for Vocational Education," and "The United States Steamboat Inspection Service." The monographs aim to give, first, the history of the establishment and development of each service; second, its functions, described by detailing its specific activities; third, its organization for the handling of these activities; fourth, the character of its plant; fifth, a compilation of or reference to the laws and regulations governing its operations; sixth, financial statements of its appropriations, expenditures, etc.

The Duttons have ready for immediate publication a new volume in their musical series, the Musician's Bookshelf, in which are already listed half a dozen or more volumes of deepest interest to musicians of all kinds. This new volume is on "Pedaling in Piano-forte Music," and is the work of Algernon H. Lindo, an English authority upon that instrument. He thinks that the correct management of the pedals is of the greatest consequence in piano-forte playing, calls it, indeed, a "subtle art," and devotes a long introductory chapter to the exposition of the principles of pedaling, the remainder of the book dealing with the practical application of those principles and with the special pedal treatment required for certain periods and composers. The text carries apt musical illustrations.

The twenty-five books which were chosen by the American Library Association and the National Educational Association as a model "two-foot bookshelf" for children were recently on exhibition at Columbia University. Harper & Brothers call attention to their Louis Rhead editions of several of these books: "Arabian Nights," Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales, "Robinson Crusoe," and "Treasure Island," and to their Holiday Edition of "Tom Sawyer," which is illustrated in color by Worth Brehm. Harpers are the exclusive publishers of another book included in this model list, "Boy's Life of Roosevelt," by Herman Hagedorn.

Alfredo Panzini, whose masterpiece, "Wanted—A Wife" ("Io Cerco Moglie"), is soon to appear in an admirable English version by Frederic Taber Cooper, is one of the foremost Italian novelists, and the only one possessed with that subtle humor which is more often associated with the Anglo-Saxon than the Latin mind. The London Times calls this novel an Italian "Kipps." The authorized translation of this book will bear the imprint of Nicholas L. Brown.

Another volume of reminiscences by G. B. Burgin, "More Memoirs and Some Travels," is announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co. His "Memoirs of a Clubman," which the Duttons brought out in the early summer, is a peculiarly entertaining narrative of memories and good stories by a man who has known literary London almost all his life, and as editor, author, and clubman has numbered among his friends most of the English men and women of letters for the past thirty years.

T. M. Longstreth in his new travel book, "The Laurentians," tells about a visit to the house of the heroine of "Maria Chapdelaine." Mr. Longstreth was up in Canada last year gathering material for his own book, and was surprised to learn that Maria was a real person, being now Maria Bedard of Peribonka. Mr. Longstreth describes Maria as he saw her, "nearing-middle-age woman still habited in her Sunday-go-to-mass clothes, whose tendency was toward portliness, but elegantly, and whose complexion still recalled the rose." Maria dislikes to talk about herself as the heroine of a novel now famous on two continents, but Monsieur Bedard does not mind talking about the novel, its author, and its characters. "Yes," said Monsieur Bedard, "Louis Hémon spent the winter with us, a silent man, and frail. I don't think our winter agreed with him. He said that he was after health and wished to work in the fields. The work in the bush was too hard for him, so he worked with me here, and in the evenings wrote. We did not know that he was writing about us, until one day after he had gone there came three copies of the book. I'm afraid they've all been taken. People will take things, you know."

Illustrated booklets devoted to the life and works of Anatole France and W. B. Maxwell have recently been printed by Dodd, Mead & Co., who will be glad to send copies on request. The same firm also issues booklets about Archibald Marshall, Louis Couperus, Jean Henri Fabre, and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Mr. Hugh Walpole has written a new novel, "The Cathedral," which is to be ready for English publication in September.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Peacemakers, Blessed and Otherwise

One of the peacemakers—blessed, not otherwise—in Miss Tarbell's book on the Washington Conference is Miss Tarbell herself. If you don't like Mr. Wilson read Miss Tarbell's account of him riding near the end of the procession on Armistice Day. And if you approve of Mr. Hughes you will approve of him more and like him no whit less. As for President Harding, who of the enlightened will deny Miss Tarbell's words: "Possibly the wisest thing that Mr. Harding has yet done as President has been to let the members of his Cabinet do their own work"? How wonderful if university presidents would take counsel there! And Japan will thank Miss Tarbell for more than fairness to them. Not that she is so at the expense of China. In fact she is very critical of persons who make points by odious comparison. Indeed this temperance of tone extends even to the author's one major irritation—France. France irritated her at Paris and more so at Washington. The best chapters in the book are those explaining France's non-cooperativeness. When Miss Tarbell has explained she does not denounce. It is unnecessary.

As for us, Miss Tarbell thinks very well of our part in the conference, and rightly. But she regrets that we did not take a stand against the submarine traffic. Slips do occur.

Meantime "what the conference seems to prove is that you can get peace by friendly negotiation—that a coöperation of nations is not a dream, that it is a reality."

PEACEMAKERS, BLESSED AND OTHERWISE, BEING OBSERVATIONS, REFLECTIONS AND IMITATIONS AT AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE. By Ida M. Tarbell. New York: The Macmillan Company; $1.60.

Facing Reality.

That we are slaves of words and machines; that we are more trivial than the Victorians, given over to sport, politics, 3 o'clocks in the morning, and snobbery; that modern drama, poetry, and novels could be better, and that religion could be better still are the contentions of a new volume by Mr. Wingfield-Stratford, ex-Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and already the author of a history of English patriotism and "The Reconstruction of Mind." The author's purpose in all his books is summed up in his quotation from Blake:

I will not cease from mental fight
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

He would have us learn the way of mental health, attain the will to reality, devote ourselves entirely to peace, and rescue (by way of religion) a world more than half disposed to blow itself to pieces with the latest improved devices.

The author, quite in accord with his belief in reality (not realism), talks to his readers in a style so clear a boy could understand it. Philosophers will find him "popular," but his book is not intended primarily for them, but for the plain man with a strain of the thoughtfulness in him.

One would expect the author when he reaches his conclusion to have more to say than he does of his panacea, religion; but after all his advice to us all to be constantly reborn, to love God and our neighbor, to grasp reality and relinquish egoism, is perhaps sufficient, if followed. Meantime he draws a dark picture of our time; but of that he may say, "There is no need that civilization should perish." It's "up to us." And as for England, "If," says he, "it shall be England's fate to be stripped and crucified for the world's salvation, what more splendid destiny could any patriot decree for her?" None, we answer, save that she live forever to be "a light of leading rare."

FACING REALITY. By Esmé Wingfield-Stratford. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.50.

Tradition and Progress.

The opening essay of "Tradition and Progress," a selection of occasional writings on popular subjects, Professor Murray calls "Religio Grammatici: The Religion of a Man of Letters." "The next three essays," says the author, "deal more or less directly with Greek subjects, or rather with the light thrown by particular phases of Greek experience upon modern problems of society and conduct and literature. Then the connection with Greece becomes slighter, and by the end of the book we are dealing directly with modern problems."

Here, in short, is the book of a lover of Greek life, and of modern life before, during, and after the war. It is fitting that the great transcriber of Euripides should interpret the "Bacchæ"; that the war should inspire a study of "Aristophanes and the War Party"; that "The Stoic Philosophy" should in 1915 engage the thoughts of a man of letters; that "The Soul as It Is and How to Deal with It" should take especial account of Gandhi and Stephen Hobhouse; that "Orbis Terrestris" should be a quiet appeal to England to deal nobly with her vast empire; that "Satanism and the World Order" should argue for love against hate in the new world of today; that

"Poesis and Mimesis" (1920) should return to Greece and afford an illuminating interpretation of Aristotle's theory of imitation. In tone the book is temperate, dignified, weighty, and urbane, and rewards a careful reading. Professor Murray, by the way, is not only Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Oxford, but was delegate for South Africa to the second assembly of the League of Nations, 1921.

TRADITION AND PROGRESS. By Gilbert Murray. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company; $3.

The Abbe Pierre.

Jay William Hudson has drawn a series of delicate portraits dovetailed with another of equally charming countryside genre pieces and called the performance "The Abbe Pierre." This kindly character who lends us his eyes to view the quiet events of his corner of Gascony merits a niche in the gallery of lovable characters in fiction. The reader with a taste for the endearing school of fiction will rejoice in the Abbe Pierre and his pride in Gascony as the cradle of a race capable of producing even in literature the doughty type of D'Artagnan and Cyrano de Bergerac.

The Abbe Pierre is hardly consistent in expressing a fear that with the passing of old brass lamps, battlement walls, and the ancient tumbledowns of the landscape, windmills, there will be nothing left for poets to sing of. From another viewpoint that might be true, but not from the abbe's. For there is nothing more interesting than humanity to visionaries of his stamp. They will always be moved by the homely signs of mankind's presence, whether it is the clank of wooden shoes on the road or a scythe hung by the door. And then there is the everlasting subject of love, which the naive old abbe does not presume to expound. He lacks worldly knowledge. He can only marvel at what seems to him a miracle and ask, what is it? Pathos and humor are merged in this book, which is probably a work of fiction that has come to stay.

ABBE PIERRE. By Jay William Hudson. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

The Ghost Girl.

In the prosaic city of New York Edgar Saltus unfolds "The Ghost Girl," a story of breathless interest, to which the author has liberally added psychometry, black magic, and materialization. However, he has the originality to omit the hackneyed haunted house. The reader is so amused by the clever manner in which the book is written that he forgets to take cognizance of the chills running up and down his spinal column and which a good ghost story is proverbially supposed to produce. Mr. Saltus' style is perhaps the most interesting feature of his book. His use of what Hugh Walpole terms that most incredible language—the new American tongue—is highly diverting. Saltus is remarkably successful in accomplishing the difficult task of making psychic phenomena plausible and simultaneously producing a good mystery story.

Sailing Vessels.

Says the Living Age: "Those of our readers who are interested in maritime affairs may recall a short description of La France, the largest sailing vessel in the world, in the Living Age of March 18th. She was a five-masted French bark of 5633 tons, built at Bordeaux in 1912. Not long ago she was wrecked on a reef one hundred miles off the west coast of New Caledonia, and is reported to be a total loss. "Originally this vessel had a Diesel engine, but it suffered the fault of many auxiliaries in being 'just big enough to kick her over a calm,' that is, too small for any real use. Consequently it was removed some time ago. Although so large a vessel, her sail spread was relatively small compared with that of our old Yankee clippers. The main yard of the Great Republic, built in Boston in 1853, was 120 feet; that of La France was but ninety feet.

"Hamburger Nachrichten prints an illustrated description of a new sailing vessel of 2400 tons just launched at Bremen. It is notable on account of its rigging. The first and third of its five masts, counting from the bow, are square-rigged, while the remaining three are schooner-rigged, the idea being that her square rig makes her a better sailer when running directly before the wind."

"THE FOOL."

They say that it took Channing Pollock a number of years to write this play. And probably he did have his leading idea in his mind—that of a good man trying to follow literally the counsels of Christ in his daily life—during those years in question, and wrote now and again a scene. But for an experienced playwright like Channing Pollock the work lacks unity and continuity, and it looks as if, when Richard Bennett applied to him for a play, he slapped his collected material together in short order, so as to be able to meet the request of the actor.

Mr. Pollock has not been wont to write plays characterized by deep thinking, and the mark of a tyro in unfamiliar territory is on "The Fool." It has echoes in it: faint echoes of "The Stranger in the House" and "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." Not that Mr. Pollock has borrowed from either of those, but they helped to mold his line of thought. The scene in "Overcoat Hall," in the third act, however, recalls Hall Caine's "The Christian," a play which to my mind was superficial and theatrical, in spite of the success it attained and the successful effect producers always contrived with the mob scene.

The man who writes a play built on the theme of "The Fool" should be, like Galsworthy, in the grip of a strong love and pity for humanity. So we feel it as we see or read his plays: "A Little Bit o' Love," "Justice," "The Strike," "The Silver Box," "The Pigeon." There are signs that Mr. Pollock has also been influenced by Galsworthy, and one thinks the better of him for unconsciously showing his appreciation of the man who wrote "The Pigeon," even while we feel that he has not yet attained the intellectual or spiritual stature to write successfully along the same line.

He has had his central idea, but we do not feel a Galsworthian spirit behind the way he carried it out. He is not sufficiently simple and sincere. There is, for such a theme, a certain pettiness in the display of the spite and back-biting exhibited by the church people in the first act. True, in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" the characters in the lodging-house show spitefulness and retail venomous gossip, but the scene is not just thrown at you without issue; the whole group is gently, skillfully manipulated by the Stranger's trustfulness toward a final state in which the audience, with melting hearts, feels the beautiful influence. What Mr. Pollock was getting at was the lack of sympathy in a fashionable parish toward the spiritual leader when he tried to follow in the footsteps of Christ. Only, Galsworthy would have simultaneously condemned, loved, and pitied.

Again, in the communings of Daniel Gilchrist with his inner self, when the colloquy in the dark takes place and Gilchrist hears the voice of his soul, or his conscience, or his diviner self, which, as it turned out, was the voice of God, say to him, "Follow the Master," the thrill of spiritual sympathy, if such there was, could not but be chilled by the purely theatrical device of throwing a small spotlight on a bearded face surrounded with flowing hair; presumably that of Christ.

In the "Overcoat Hall" scene—located in the resort for down-and-outers started by Gilchrist when he finds that he and the church do not want each other—there is certainly opportunity for dramatic effect, and many, viewing the number of odd and out-of-the-way characterizations introduced by the author, would say that he has fully availed himself of it. He has, in a way. The spectator is interested, entertained. But somehow the sympathies are not thoroughly reached.

Take the character of the crippled child, Mary Margaret, for instance. Jenny Wren probably had a share in her creation, although her function in the play took her quite away eventually from Dickens' conception. But in "The Fool," Mary Margaret—as no doubt Jenny Wren would be, also—was of the theatre theatrical.

In this scene there were women in lowly walks of life, one of them a silken-clad Magdalen in the grip of a consuming love for the young minister. She comes to warn the young disciple of the Christ doctrine that her deserted husband, thinking him responsible for her fall, has come to kill him. Hence the mob scene.

This scene is very carefully worked up, with yells, scuffles, wild excitement, culminating in a miracle—without any relevancy—by which Mary Margaret, after a wild, audible prayer, is cured of her lameness.

In the last act the ex-lovers—Gilchrist had a sweetheart, who abandoned him in favor of a wealthy suitor who did not throw his money away on the poor, like the young disciple—have one of their peculiarly dry scenes. She comes to tell him she still loves him, but his virtue is proof against the assault. Her jealous, dissipated husband is now lame; apparently Mary Margaret has worked off her disability on him. There is a not particularly successful attempt at injecting comedy by having Mary Margaret present the young minister with a hideous chromo, which she greatly admires.

Then, at last, solitude. The disciple of Christ communes with his soul, and through the back of his head Bennett manages to convey to the audience that Gilchrist says to himself, "It is well with my soul, it is well. I am on the right path."

This theme, it will be remembered, Hauptmann, the German dramatist and novelist, handled with much greater effectiveness in a novel called "Johannes" wasn't it? And "The Idiot" is the title of Dostoevsky's novel, also about a man, an epileptic, animated by the spirit of Christ. But both of those writers were always, in their works, moved preëminently by a deep love of humanity.

Richard Bennett is an actor of creditable ambitions, and has appeared a number of times in rôles which show that he has placed his aspirations high. He is of the modern school of acting, and sometimes he is so natural that his meaning is not fully conveyed; particularly when he tries to convey it with his back to the audience.

He is not a genius, but he is a valuable man to his profession, because he has made himself a good actor with high ideals. In "The Fool" he fills his rôle with due effect without any attempt to monopolize the stage centre, his principal lack being a deficiency of strongly marked personality.

On account of his fair play the company has ample opportunity, particularly in rendering the character rôles of the various personages that appear at Overcoat Hall.

The company filling the numerous cast has been carefully rehearsed and their work is most conscientious, although not striking; Clair Verda, in the leading lady's rôle, conveying a sort of dryness of feeling in uttering Clare Jewett's protestations of love.

Of the others, the two, aside from the star, who had a little gift for submerging their conscientiousness in their rôles are Mr. Hugh Metcalfe in the rôle of the elder Goodkind and Mitzi Kimball as the lame girl, Miss Kimball, although somewhat stereotyped, playing the rôle in a manner most acceptable to the audience; which, by the way, was not the usual first night crowd.

Whether it was church people or not I know not, but, although it seemed non-receptive at first, its final verdict was that of approval. At any rate the star, during his speech, showed himself grateful and happy.

"THE RIVALS."

It was quite an inspired idea for the Vaughan-Rainey combination to produce "The Rivals," for they had a company of almost half a dozen professionals organized by taking in Emelie Melville and pretty Ann O'Day. Reginald Travers might be said to be already in the combination, and as for the others, the majority has had so much experience before paying houses that it may be said to be more than semi-professional.

"The Rivals," although throwing the rôles of Mrs. Malaprop, Sir Anthony, Captain Absolute and Bob Acres well in the spotlight, offers, like all the Sheridan comedies, excellent opportunity for good team work.

Sheridan was thoroughly conventional in his custom of giving every character the stage centre, if only once; of alternating scenes for the two different pairs of lovers, and for the important characters.

Perhaps, indeed, it was he who established the conventions; but at any rate, one is struck by them in seeing or reading the play. Jack and Lydia alternate with Falkland and Julia, although Julia has been suppressed, posterity condemning the foolishness of Falkland and Julia's love affair. Every gentleman's gentleman has his little turn at the stage centre, and pretty, scheming Lucy also has her chance, while Sir Lucius O'Trigger's rôle, late as that personage appears in the play, has many a time been played by famous actors.

The performance that is being given at the Players Theatre this week offers little opportunity for anything but commendation, Emelie Melville offering a fine old traditional portrait of Mrs. Malaprop. Gorgeously costumed, dictatorial in voice and bearing, she makes that doughty dame so much the stage figure of another day that we almost rub our eyes, and look to see the name of some famous actress of the past. This depiction of Mrs. Malaprop, which, by the way, Emelie Melville also gave one midsummer night at the Greek Theatre with William Crane playing with her as Sir Anthony, is quite the best thing I have seen her do during her present sojourn of some years in San Francisco.

Mr. Reginald Travers' long experience as an actor enables him easily to assume the rôle of the choleric Sir Anthony, whom he invests with that panoply of testy authority which so easily ran into suggestions of impending apoplexy in the days before fathers learned that they no longer can call their sons to heel.

Evelyn Vaughan as Lydia Languish has no such possibilities as in last week's play. Lydia, of course, is an awful goose, and as such actresses must play her. The rôle, in fact, is as subsidiary to that of Mrs. Malaprop as Lydia was in worldly matters subordinate to her formidable aunt. The principal qualities Lydia is required to contribute are beauty, charm, and a pretty touch of comedy. These qualifications Miss Vaughan possessing in sufficient measure, it follows that her Lydia is well done; but as the lady is not only a good actress, but has the gift of personality, I shall look forward with interest to seeing her in her next rôle; for it is whispered that the Players have something particularly interesting up their sleeve, and we have hopes that Miss Vaughan's services will be retained.

Mr. Rainey, in the handsome and picturesque costumes of Captain Absolute, made an uncommonly comely figure of that engaging young schemer, acting the part with that gay nonchalance and that insouciant gallantry characteristic of Jack Absolute, and singing most agreeably one or two songs of the times.

Ann O'Day, in a ravishingly coquettish little costume, made the daintiest and most beguiling of Lucys; a delightful little incarnation of a kind of figure that has passed away from modern drama.

Frank Keenan Wallace endowed Sir Lucius O'Trigger with a very good Irish brogue, and helped to make the scene in which that professional fire-eater figured go with considerable éclat. And Frederick McNulty's talent for burlesque enabled him to give a Bob Acres that greatly amused the audience, in spite of the fact that no less august a player than Joseph Jefferson has played that same rôle here in old San Francisco. Callen R. Tjader made a very acceptable Fag, and Joseph Sturgis and Louis Wood White completed the cast.

The idea of dressing the pretty girl orchestra in the powder-and-puff costume of the time was a most happy one, and added to the generally decorative effect of the entire performance.

To this generally decorative effect a number of carefully considered details contributed: the richness of fabric and striking colors of the costumes, the opulent sets, with the graceful, gilded furniture; and the minuet performed with notably stately grace by Mrs. Melville and Mr. Travers.

Miss Vaughan's fine appearance gained

In the Spirit of Co-operation

To meet the urgent need for more water in San Francisco, 24 million gallons daily will be added to the supply by this company.

The additional water will be drawn from the Calaveras Reservoir in Alameda County and will be brought into service through a new Spring Valley aqueduct and through the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit.

The city of San Francisco and the Spring Valley Water Company are coöperating to make feasible this augmenting of the supply.

Their coöperation is based on a working relationship whose conditions were originally laid down by the Railroad Commission.

The Board of Supervisors added certain other conditions before unanimously approving the programme of coöperation.

One of the original conditions was that Spring Valley should pay the city for the use of the Hetch Hetchy conduit to bring the additional water from Irvington to Crystal Springs Reservoir.

The city added the condition that Spring Valley should pay the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds for the construction of this conduit.

Spring Valley, in the spirit of co-operation, accepted this with the other conditions, thus completely freeing the taxpayers from the burden of interest.

This whole water agreement strikes a new note in the relations between a city and a privately-owned water company. There is no precedent for it in water service anywhere in our country.

novelty and beauty from the black hair she wore, and the excellent good taste of her lovely costumes still further enhanced Lydia Languish's beauty and charm.

The picturesque revival of the old custom of sending out handsomely liveried flunkies to light a row of candles in lieu of our modern footlights had an aesthetically pleasing effect, as did also the white-wigged and puffed and panniered picturesqueness of the two pretty musicians, who gave still another charm to the general effect by playing old-time English airs such as we heard in "The Beggar's Opera."

PROFESSIONAL TRUTHS.

I have always considered that acting must be a most trying occupation, and that if the young people eagerly seeking a stage career could look ten years ahead many of them would renounce the possible triumphs that talent wins for the calmer if duller life lived by the ungifted majority. There are certain retirements from the stage from the surprise of which ardent theatre-goers have never recovered; Mary Anderson's, for instance. And Forbes-Robertson, although no longer young, retired in the full tide of his fame, for the public showed no signs of having had enough of him. But he was weary of it, and longed for privacy.

In the later years of his career Edwin Booth showed plainly that the inspiration of earlier years was waning. In fact, the ready imagination of youth ceases to function at a certain stage, the magnetism that, as a general thing, belongs to the season of physical attractiveness fades and dies, and then—what?

An automatic working of the technique and artistic finish evolved by years of experience must satisfy the artist; the artist who had once so adored his art.

Artists, of course, do not generally tell the truth. If the interviewer conscientiously endeavors to pry something loose from the interviewed that does not show the marks of careful and labored preparation, he is seldom rewarded. The young things twitter, the old ones reminisce.

But at a recent interview given by Wilton Lackaye to an expert in starting players to talk and reveal themselves the veteran star told a lot of home truths. It all came from his first offering the bitter truths of experience to his son, who wished to be an actor. Youth, of course, never, or almost never, heeds such warnings. Mr. Lackaye's experiences are legion. They are those of hardship, short runs when long ones were expected; the humiliation of failing when lesser players won big successes. They are the losing of family life, the missing of family festivities. They are the perpetual motion, the life in trains, hotels, and theatres. Part of the disenchantment comes from seeing how small is the artist's financial return—he who gets all the public acclaim—as compared with the immense winnings of the manager.

I was rather staggered when I read the article, realizing how easy it is, without knowing anything about it, to complain that the prices of theatre seats are too high because of the salaries paid players. Mr. Lackaye gave a few figures, and said that his boodle was not made by acting, but by managing and backing a play.

I think perhaps a perception is coming to people of the profession that unless they rise to that thin ether where dwell the eternal stars there is little money in it for them. Al Jolson is making a huge income, but it proves nothing but Al Jolson, who, by the way, made his millions in various ways connected with the stage instead of on it.

Thus the players are venturing, nowadays, for business on their own account, the which is probably looked at with a jaundiced eye by the managers.

One thing is sure: this is a time of transition in the theatrical business. The big managers have been in a state of alarm for two or three years. They were very scornful of the suggestion made last winter by George Arliss, that the cycle had swung around again for the stock company to be re-instituted. Cogent reasons were advanced against it, and yet we have had great joys in past years from the high-class stock company. And if there were a series of stock companies established in a number of the leading cities of the country there would be excellent opportunities supplied for splendid team work, for the gradual ripening of immature but promising art in the younger members, and for the harassed players to wrest from fate occasional pause of a year or so in their perpetual pilgrimage.

IN RE PLAYERS' SALARIES.

The always vital subject of actors' salaries has been the subject of a very courteous and reasonably expressed communication to the Actors' Equity Association, written by A. H. Woods, the well-known Eastern producer. Mr. Woods has a lot of plays up his sleeve, and he wishes to produce them provided the "fantastic salaries" now being drawn by players do not continue to retain their present high figure.

Mr. Woods points out that if they do not come down there will be very scant pickings this winter for the acting profession; and, remembering the disastrously large number of plays that were withdrawn during the last and the present season in little old New York, the dramatic hub of the American universe, it is not surprising that readers out as well as in the profession will be much impressed by Mr. Woods' exhortation.

And he strengthens it by adding to it the statement that, in any event, "a force stronger than Equity or the Producing Managers' Association is going to bring them down. It's an economic law."

The gratifying feature in the affair is that the Equity leaders, who printed the communication in the association's publication, have an editorial note appended to the communication in which is recognized Mr. Woods' friendliness toward Equity and his fairness in stating the question.

Then follows a suggestion, which won't suit the producing managers a little bit, but which seems to have the elements of fairness in it.

It is to the effect that the actors consent to a lowering of their salaries, but that they be allowed a percentage of the gross receipts over a certain amount; the point being that the actor must live during the idle weeks following the cessation of the season, even though producing managers may not see the necessity.

The point is well taken, and promises to open up very considerable discussion. But what is still more interesting about it than its face value is the fact that it will be pounced on by workers of other professions, whose salaries, it is plain, must eventually come down.

And there is still another point, apparently overlooked by Equity, but which the Producing Managers' Association will be sure to bring up, for they will doubtless point out that if the actor earns his percentage of the gross receipts, must he not also expect to put up with his share of the loss, if the run proves unprofitable?

Out of all this something is going to come; perhaps a reorganization of the whole question, which may, perhaps, make for greater financial health and balance on both sides in a possibly rosier future.

COUGHING.

The subject of coughing in the theatre has come up so many times that it seems pertinent to air a few observations on the subject. The cougher, of course, says indignantly, "I can't help it." But he can; unless, indeed, he is so far gone that he should not go to the theatre at all. Lots of people don't know that they can stifle a cough; that it is better for the vocal chords, and for the ailment itself, to stifle it.

If theatre managers would put the same heartfelt adjuration not to cough on their programs as they do to remove hats, they would find it efficacious; particularly if they added, "Doctors say it is better to repress a cough. Try it."

There are always, of course, contrary people who experience a passionate desire to do a thing if they are advised not to. But if a courteous usher would offer a tall, chilly-looking glass of cold water to the graveyard cougher, he might realize he was in the wrong place.

Concerted action on the part of the injured audience might work. It is, of course, the duty of a man who suddenly develops a frog in his throat to go outside and kill the frog. If, however, he remains, then the audience, as with one accord, should turn and look at him reproachfully.

It doesn't work when only one—the man whose backbone you are industriously kicking—turns and tries to slay you with a look. But when a number of people turn their heads uneasily to view the offender he feels like the unoffending spectator in the proscenium box upon whom the spotlight is suddenly turned.

Perhaps a little facetiousness might work; a few mild jokes about the cough syrup that mother used to make being on tap. But one thing is sure: the cougher in the theatre is a common nuisance who merely needs to exercise a little self-control, and that plain cold fact should be made in some way to penetrate his hide.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

It is said that the Actors' Equity Association is becoming very powerful. Already it has been instrumental in doing away with many abuses from which players have suffered; among others insufficiently cleaned and ventilated dressing-rooms. As a result players are getting spunky, and now the women players have scared up sufficient courage to request that the influence of Equity may be exerted in doing away with coarse and suggestive scenes, lines, and situations in plays. And no doubt the scandalized Broadway producers are all saying, "Well! What next?"

Clemence Dane, author of "The Bill of Divorcement," has run against a snag with her play in blank verse entitled "Will Shakespeare." Blank verse, or verse of any kind, is a ticklish medium to use in this era of realism in the drama. But the trouble was that instead of painting Shakespeare as a demi-god, Miss Dane depicted him as a youth of twenty, his character still in the making. And the portrait did not please an idealizing public that wants its gods left with a bright aura. In "Will Shakespeare" the bard was unkind to Anne Hathaway, the playwright developing the idea that out of his sins was developed the ability to create Hamlet and Macbeth. In the meantime, while "Will Shakespeare" failed in London town, the metropolis of her native land, "A Bill of Divorcement," which the author considers a lesser and "ordinary, well-written play," continues to attract crowds. And it is her first play. Verily, life is full of the unexpected.

We can not very well blame players who are established favorites in the East for feeling able to abstain from capturing San Francisco by the splendor of their art. New York is generally home to them, and everywhere they go is nearer home than San Francisco. We are, as a consequence, humbly used in our far-off isolation to waiting till the big guns grow old before they come our way. But there are new possibilities for us. It is said that many popular players are out of a job in New York, and that those who are in one are not such an awfully tight fit. Hence the great favorites can not so firmly refuse to go on prolonged tours as formerly; or so it is whispered. And perhaps—oh, perhaps—some more big guns will come out our way. We San Franciscans like big guns, just as much as other folks do, and we don't see them so awfully often. So, although we are not praying for their lack of prosperity, it is an ill wind that doesn't blow somebody something; or words to that effect.

The Columbia Theatre.

"The Fool" has made a hit at the Columbia Theatre, where it will be seen for a second and final week commencing with Monday, September 4th. It has every quality to hold interest and is presented by a cast of exceptional fitness.

"The Rear Car," said to be "battier than 'The Bat,'" comes to the Columbia on Monday, September 11th, with Richard Bennett in the rôle of the silly-ass "deflector" who gets tangled in the many mysterious happenings on the eastward trip. The play is by Edward E. Rose and has already created a sensation.

Among other coming attractions for the Columbia are the stage production of "Nice People," "The Gold Diggers," Mitzi in "Lady Billy," and "The Merry Widow."

Scientists claim that the North Pole is gradually moving south. Maybe it will discover Dr. Cook yet.—Life Lines.

John McCormack's Plans.

Mr. D. F. McSweeney, manager of John McCormack, the Irish tenor, writing from Paris to Frank W. Healy, McCormack's local representative, says:

"I have just spent a week with McCormack at Stow-on-the-Wold, Gloucestershire. He looks better today than he has for several years. He spends two hours a day, Sundays excepted, rain or shine, roaming the countryside, shooting rabbits, and when the gamekeeper is not looking, an occasional partridge. He is as rabid a tennis fan as ever; a set or two between showers is almost a daily event. He is on a sort of eat and grow thin diet. When I met him at the Savoy Hotel I was agreeably surprised to see how well he looked. His friends may rest assured that his voice is as good as it ever was right now. He could give a concert tomorrow, but he won't. He has made up his mind to take a good long rest, and I do not think that any one will deny that he is entitled to it. John McCormack's voice is one of the treasures of the world and he holds it in trust as such."

"Two days after my arrival in London I heard him sing for the first time since the concert he gave in Chicago on April 2d. His first song was 'Oft in the Stilly Night.' I won't attempt to tell you how I felt, but it was certainly good to hear his voice again, the voice we feared during Holy Week would be stilled forever."

"The next time I heard Mr. McCormack sing was at one of the most interesting and enjoyable functions I have ever had the privilege of attending. It was at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Antonio de Navarro at Broadway, Worcestershire. Mme. de Navarro, as you know, was the incomparable Mary Anderson ('Our Mary'). The Navarros were celebrating the thirty-second anniversary of their wedding and the McCormacks the sixteenth, and I do not believe a more happily married quartet ever celebrated an anniversary. Mr. McCormack has decided to take things easy until the spring of 1923, when he will return to America for a brief tour."

The Orpheum Next Week.

Theodore Roberts has gained fame as an artist both on the screen and on the legitimate stage, but his present engagement is his first on the speaking stage for a good many years. Mr. Roberts is a native-born San Franciscan and it is particularly fitting that his first personal appearance after a long time on the silver screen should be in his native city.

Max Fisher and his orchestra are a synopated sensation. Every man in the organization is an artist.

Lloyd and De Voe are likable young men and their singing and kidding cover a wide range of entertainment.

Ernest Hiatt assures us that it's "Nothing Serious," and the audience has a delightful time roaring at his brand of humor.

Hurst and O'Donnell have been "Profiteering in Fun," and their subjects are gainers rather than losers.

Oakes and Delour will appear with their "Cycle of Cyclonic Dances."

Duffy and Kellar have a new idea in their "Via Telephone."

VANITY FAIR.

There is said to be drifting through the American mind today a growing interest in the formularies of social life, and that this interest is broadening and deepening into what threatens to become a real fad. Books on the subject are in demand, some have even made money for the authors, and evidences multiply that more people are reading, studying, and thinking about the subject than ever before. If this is so, it is a good symptom and the fad will be a good thing, for we need to pay more serious attention to our manners, and the best way to accomplish any general result is through some popular craze. It would be a relief if Americans were suddenly to become enamored of proper personal conduct, for they would elevate mere form into an art, and make it the expression of the kindness which distinguishes them among modern peoples. They have heretofore paid scant attention to the forms of deportment merely because they were forms. They have felt that, in the words of the old Gilbert and Sullivan song, "No matter what you do if your heart be true, and his heart was true to Poll." They have been conscious always that their hearts were true, and so were satisfied that their conduct would be; under which assurance they have permitted themselves such nightmare ceremonials as "Mr. Smith, shake hands with Mr. Brown," which is enough to set on edge the teeth of a Winne-mucca Piute or a Mexican peon; because Mr. Smith may not wish to shake hands with any one, and may have a particular dread of any personal contact whatever with the aforesaid Brown, a sentiment which Brown may reciprocate. As a people we appear to have missed altogether the important fact that the rigid daily and hourly observance of form is in itself an invaluable discipline which strengthens men instead of weakening them, elevating self-respect and steeling character for the work it has to do. What other equally valuable function has military ceremonial; the salute, the drills, the manual of arms? These bring men into a frame of mind to act their part as men when the need arises. And any man who is punctilious about his conduct is the stronger for it, exactly as his mind will function more clearly if he drills himself to good grammatical and syntactical usage.

That is an individual value. Beyond it, is a social value difficult to overestimate. Good manners are the lubricant of community life. If they mean anything at all they mean the forms under which it has been found most convenient and profitable for human relations to operate. Underlying them is the finest humanity—consideration, kindness, cheerfulness, helpfulness. It is not good manners to drag your personal griefs into your conversation, to the distress of your friends, who can not lighten them. It is not good manners to say or do embarrassing things, and hence as we have no knowledge just what things may at times be embarrassing it is bad manners to make personal remarks, unless they are called for by some particular and beneficial purpose. It is not good manners to do things that are vulgar, and make your friends ashamed. Of such are the principles of proper personal conduct; and it can not be dispensed with in any order of society if that order is to do its work smoothly. Even Nigger Jim and Huckleberry Finn on the raft in the Mississippi had need of it, and Jim justly complained of the practical joke Huck played on him, which wrung his heart with dread and "threw dirt in the face of a friend." It is not good manners to play practical jokes, unless they be very innocent and friendly and conceived in real kindness. The world is no such hilarious place that we can afford to enhance the misery of life to others in order to enjoy it more ourselves. It is bad manners to put the other person at a disadvantage, or in the wrong, or force him to embarrassing explanations. It is bad manners to arouse repugnance, and so we no longer eat with our knives, although once it was done by the most eminent men. That we have begun to pay attention to such seeming trifles is no sign of degeneracy, for they are only trifles in seeming—they are really as important as many of our laws. They are, in fact, the basis of the law of social intercourse, and they help sweeten life for everybody. A refined civilization will take on such hall-marks of its refinement, and it will do it without fear of weakening itself or the character of its members. Persons there may be who will argue that when Rome became over-civilized she fell; but Rome had other reasons for going down—as many as there are historians to invent them. And we are in no present danger from over-refinement.

On grounds wholly economic, the government of Japan seems about to attack the drinking of sake, or rice beer. Sake itself seems mild and innocent enough, but it takes about 20,000,000 bushels of the nation's best rice to brew it, and this the government thinks is needed for food. The Britisher supposes beer to be food, but the Japanese government appears to think otherwise, and is going to offer the market a substitute made from starch pulp and hydro-chloric acid. Where the starch pulp is to come from is not stated, but there are several sources besides rice. The situation recalls the story of the two miners, one of whom went to town for supplies. He returned with a loaf of bread and a demijohn of whisky, to be greeted with the angry demand: "What in hell'd you git so much bread for?" The Japanese people seem to be eating too much rice and not leaving enough for the brewers, or else the brewers are taking too much from the cooking pots. The small sake cup in general use looks harmless enough, but it is said that it is filled some thirty or thirty-five times at a sitting, so it bears no real relation to the quantity imbibed, nor is it any check upon the bibulousness of the imbibitor. Japan is already a large importer of rice, some of which comes from California, and the proposal of the government experts and scientists may affect the export trade of this state to some degree if the hydro-chloric acid substitute should come into general use. Whether this chemical compound will furnish the same stimulus, with the same bouquet, as real sake is something still conjectural. If it is anything like the substitutes permitted us under the Volstead Act it will, as the negro porter said, "lack authority." Neither fiat money nor flat beer seems to be just what humanity wants, and either confirms the theory that it is easier to tell what people do not want than what they do. The problem, however, is in this case up to the Japanese government, which is both strong and adroit. If it decrees that the people shall drink hydro-chloric acid and wood pulp we may be sure they will drink just that or go very dry. And it would certainly release a great deal of rice, perhaps to the grief of some of the California rice farmers.

Before those skirts are lengthened, Policeman Lee of the classic city of Berkeley is to have his innings, officially and correctly, and altogether in the line of duty. We all love duty, but some duty is sweeter than other duty. Tantalization may be an incident of Policeman Lee's duty in this case, but we may be sure he will never shirk it. The medicine will be easy to take, no matter how numerous the doses. Three pairs of brown silk stockings were larcenously abducted from a clothes-line in the aforesaid classic city on a recent evening of "faculty moonlight," and August Vollmer, penologist, sociologist, psychologist, expert criminologist, and chief of Berkeley's police department, has set Policeman Lee the task of finding 'em. In the absence of any thumb prints or toe prints or occult demonstrations of ownership through any lingering aura of the organs that once rightfully inhabited those stockings, but one resource suggests itself; Policeman Lee will have to look for them. And where shall he look? Why, where else should he look? He is convinced that they were taken by a woman, because the clothespins were replaced, which in all Policeman Lee's experience as a thief taker no male thief has been known to do. This beats Sherlock Holmes in the first half lap. Supplied by the former wearer with a complete description of the missing hose, it will become the office of the patrolman to stand at corners where street-cars are being mounted, and keep his weather eye peeled. How altitudinously the inspection is to proceed is not specified, but we may presume all due facilities will be granted. In fact, any wearer of hose attempting to conceal them by crouching, or holding down skirts while mounting car steps will invite suspicion at once. In this crisis it will be found best to reveal rather than conceal, and certainly there has been during the past few years no apparent reluctance in revelation. "Clocks" and "runs" and embroidered butterflies and lacy perforations will all come under the scrutiny of the vigilant representative of the law. And he has not asked for help. It may be devotion to duty on his part, or it may be selfishness, but he seems willing to assume the whole assignment and see it through. It may be taken as granted that the finish will not come too soon. Linked sweetness long drawn out is what may normally be expected in such a case; and Policeman Lee has a front seat at the big show.

Bavaria Against Prussia.

Recent events in Bavaria have strengthened rather than weakened the cause of the Pan-Germans, and have tended to widen rather than close the breach that divides North from South Germany, says the Boston Evening Transcript. The opposition of the Social Democrats to Count Lerchenfeld, the Bavarian premier, has gone up in smoke, with the result that the Munich cabinet has the backing of a clear majority in the Diet in its refusal to carry out the law passed by the German Reich for the protection of the republic. Whether or not the majority of the Bavarians are supporting Count Lerchenfeld is by no means clear. Nevertheless the political cleavage between Bavaria and Prussia—the two most important of the German states by far—is marked, and the doctrine of nullification, now insisted upon by Munich, leads as logically and as necessarily to the disruption of the republic as the doctrine of nullification in this country, more than half a century ago, led to the disruption of the Union.

The issue that has now caused Munich to throw its glove down in defiance to Berlin is one of more than passing significance. Behind Bavaria's defiance lies the spectre of a monarchical restoration, and the creation of a new state, dedicated to the advancement of Pan-Germanism. Monarchical reactionary Bavaria is a haven of refuge for the monarchists, the Pan-Germans, and the reactionaries of all Germany. Once a name that conjured up all that was harsh, repellent, and soul-destroying in the German character, Prussia apparently is the chief nursery of the democratic virtues, while Bavaria, a name that once brought to mind the lighter and more humanistic aspects of the German character, has taken under its aegis the elements of reaction that exist in present-day Germany. Bavaria, moreover, is predominantly Catholic, while Prussia is predominantly Protestant, and a still further factor that is drawing the two states apart is the desire of many Bavarians to cast in their lot with Catholic Austria by the establishment of a state that would embrace all, or the greater part, of Bavaria and Austria.

Compromise, the great remedy for political differences, may conceivably settle Prussia's quarrel with the Bavarian cabinet. Not every Bavarian, surely, can approve the defiant attitude of their government. Yet the situation must inevitably remain a dangerous one for some time to come, more particularly as Bavaria's recalcitrancy has come at a moment when the German republic faces fiscal ruin.

Beatrice Grimshaw has just returned from her plantation in Papua for a visit to her former home in England, remarks a writer in the New York Times Book Review. For fifteen years she roamed all through the South Pacific, and has now made Papua her home. On her plantation she finds natives from the cannibal tribes her best workers; she says they are intelligent and adaptable and very strong physically, perhaps because of their unusual diet. They prefer the meat of natives to that of whites—the latter is inclined to be a bit too salty for their taste. Miss Grimshaw says the Papuans are natural traders and have an instinct for construction, and she thinks they resemble Americans in both these points. She has visited America and calls it "the paradise of impatient people." Leap year is every year in Papua; at least, it is never beyond the bounds of propriety for a girl to propose marriage, but her father demands a price from the bridegroom proportionate to her beauty and accomplishments. The coin of the realm is either pigs or clam-shell bracelets. A wife may be paid for on the installment plan, and must be returned to her parents if payments are not duly made.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

She was in high feather, as she had succeeded in securing a "plus four" man to take her around. "Do you like a high tee?" he inquired at the first tee. "Rather, George," was her enthusiastic reply; "let's make it sausages and bacon."

Tit-Bits has a story of a deaf bridegroom who upon being repeatedly asked the conventional question, "Do you take this woman for your lawful wife?" finally got angry and said, "Oh, I don't know. She ain't so awful. I've seen wus'n her that didn't have as much money."

The preacher had been strolling about the links, and wishing to drive home a small moral lesson said mildly, "I notice that the players who get the lowest scores are not those who swear." "Why the hell should they?" demanded the gloomy golfer as he dug up some more turf.

The famous artist had painted a portrait of himself and his wife. His little son, brought in for a private view, said: "I think it's pretty. But who is the strange lady?" "Hyacinth," said the artist reproachfully, "don't you recognize your own mother?" "Oh, but then why did you paint her with that strange man?"

The continental traveler deposited an enormous bag beside the table in the restaurant car. The conductor promptly rebuked him. "Don't you know you can't bring your luggage in here. You'll have to put that bag in the van." "Luggage," sneered the traveler. "That isn't luggage. That's my purse. I'm going to Austria."

At a railroaders' banquet in Scranton, W. W. Inglis, the well-known coal operator, told the story of the man who after traveling on a little branch line about twelve miles long, notorious for its dirt and discomfort, said: "Thank heavens, the worst of my journey is over!" "Come far?" inquired a fellow-sufferer. "No," said the first chap; "going to Cochín, China."

A salesman who had taken a large order for goods in a Scotch town offered the canny Scot with whom he was dealing a box of fine Hayanass. "Naw," said the Scotchman, "don't try tae bribe a mon. I cudna tak them." "Well," said the salesman, "suppose I sell them to you for a nominal sum? Say six-pence?" "In that case," the Scot cheerfully answered, "since you press me I wadna refuse an offer so well meant. I'll be taking two boxes."

A lady who is devoted to her home environment and stays there the year around was assailed by a friend who scarcely remains at home long enough to acquire an environment. Said the fashionable friend, "I knew that you wintered here, but I was astonished to learn that you summered here, too." "I have not only wintered here and summered here," said the unfashionable one, "but you will be even more astonished to learn that I always fall here and have sometimes sprung here."

An addition was expected to the family and the ten-year-old daughter was sent to the country, while Johnnie, aged nine, remained at home. When the new arrival made its appearance, Johnnie's father wrote a long telegram to his little daughter and dispatched Johnnie with two dollars to defray the cost. When the youngster returned he gave his father a dollar and sixty cents change. "What's this?" demanded his father. "Did you send my wire?" "Certainly," answered Johnnie, "but it was too long. I cut it down." "But what did you say?" queried his exasperated parent. Johnnie handed him a copy of the telegram, which read: "Dear Susie—I win. It's a boy.—Johnnie."

Judge's prize story for the week is even better than usual, though we frequently think their "second prize" story better than the first: "A clergyman was having tea with a family newly settled in his parish. On the sideboard were several decanters, filled with what looked like spirits. 'My friend,' he said to his hostess, 'you should avoid even the appearance of evil. I do not suggest that you drink, but—' 'Why, Vicar, they're only filled with furniture polish. It's the decanters I like; they're so pretty.' 'Exactly,' said the vicar, 'avoid even the appearance of evil, I repeat. I helped myself to a drink from the big decanter in the middle.'"

An Englishman staying at a Nevada ranch suggested one morning that his host walk with him to a nearby mountain. Of course, the Britisher was deceived in the appearance of the distance. After walking several hours and the mountain seeming no nearer, he was told that it was still twenty-five miles away and that the deception was due to the rare atmosphere of Nevada. Returning home by a different route, they came upon an irrigated field. At the first irrigation ditch the Englishman sat down and began to remove his shoes. "What on earth are you going to do?" inquired the Nevada. The Englishman contemplated the ditch and said, "Why, I'm going to swim this blooming river."

A story told on the late Dean Stanley refers to his thorough immobility in the pulpit. Preaching one morning at Westminster Abbey, he was pleased to notice the perfect attention of his congregation. At the close of the service he remarked to his wife upon their steadfast attendance on his words. "They never seemed to take their eyes off me," he told her with obvious gratification. "No wonder, my dear," said Lady Agatha, "seeing you had one of your gloves on your head all the time you were preaching." Placing his gloves in his hat on leaving home, the dean had removed his hat in the vestry upon being gowned and had walked reverently to the pulpit unaware that he was carefully balancing one glove on his head.

"And you are ninety-five years old!" she exclaimed. "How wonderful! You look so well, so strong, so young. How have you managed to do it?" "My method is very simple," the venerable gentleman replied. "I have never let any of my friends know if I didn't happen to be feeling well, consequently I've never had to take any of the things they would have recommended if they had known I was ailing."—Pickup.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Confirmation.

"Getting out of bed should be a leisurely, not a hurried process. The act of springing from bed is bad, because it accelerates the action of the heart suddenly after the period of repose."—The inevitable "Harley Street physician" as reported in a contemporary.

Why arise with senseless haste?
Bed has got a pleasant taste;
Hurry would be most misplaced.

If they call you, never mind—
They will come again, you'll find;
Do not rush to draw the blind.

Why consult your window-pane?
Ten to one it's wet again;
If it's not, it's going to rain.

Do not look for joyous thrills
From the stuff the postman spills;
Let them lie—they're merely bills.

Breakfast? Cut it out, I say,
Lunch will do as well today;
Overeating doesn't pay.

And in fact I now recall
Days that tempted me to drawl,
"Why on earth get up at all?"

And the answer, I decreed,
Was that, anyway, the deed
Wasn't one that called for speed.

Rise I might; but this affair
Needed some deliberate care—
Haste increased life's wear and tear.

Now, I'm rather pleased to see,
I was right as right could be:
Harley Street agrees with me!

A Lincoln Myth.

A popular Lincoln myth will be a currency from Mr. Taft's speech to the Press Club the other day, remarks the Manchester Guardian. He quoted as Lincoln's the familiar saying, "You can fool all the people part of the time and part of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time."

A few years ago the authenticity of this saying was investigated, and no ground whatever could be found for attributing it to Lincoln. It does not occur in any of the great President's writings or speeches, and neither Mr. Hay nor Mr. Nicolay—who collaborated in the authoritative Lincoln biography—was able to discover any trace of it. According to Mr. A. R. Spofford of the Library of Congress, who carried out the inquiry, the real author of the saying was Phineas T. Barnum. If so we have underrated Barnum.

One would prefer to believe that it was Lincoln who said it, and, in spite of historical research, probably it was.

A writer in the London Times makes an appeal for the return of the stones of the Reims Cathedral, carried off by curio-hunters; and the Times very properly gives this request a prominent position on its editorial page. However, a carping critic, who writes to the London Herald, is unkind enough to quote the following from the advertising pages of the June 17, 1921, issue of the Times:

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of CYCOL as shown on the CYCOL Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The engagement of Miss Harriet Campbell and Miss Eleanor Campbell, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. William R. L. Campbell of Claremont, to Mr. Arthur Webster, Jr., and Mr. William Rochelle Blair were announced at a tea given Saturday by Mrs. Campbell. Three hundred guests were in attendance.

Two weddings will take place Saturday, September 30th, when Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell becomes the bride of Mr. James Moffitt and Miss Elva Ghirardelli is married to Mr. John Welby Dinsmore.

The marriage of Miss Schmiedell and Mr. Moffitt will be solemnized at 4 o'clock at St. John's Episcopal Church in Ross. After the wedding a reception will be held at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Schmiedell. The Rev. Charles Deems will perform the ceremony. Miss Doris Schmiedell will be her sister's maid of honor and the bridesmaids will be Miss Alice Moffitt, Miss Margaret Scheld, Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, and Miss Aileen McIntosh. Mr. Howard Spreckels will be the best man and Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Edward Schmiedell, Jr., Mr. Richard McLaren, Mr. William Magee, and Mr. Cyril McNear will be the ushers.

The wedding of Miss Ghirardelli and Mr. Dinsmore will take place at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Louis Ghirardelli, in Oakland. Mrs. Harry Magee will be her sister's matron of honor and Mr. Thomas Dinsmore will be the groomsmen for his brother. After the wedding trip Mr. Dinsmore and his bride will reside in Piedmont.

Miss Carroll Cambron will be married to Mr. Stanley Morrison September 28th. Miss Lisa Stillman will be the maid of honor and Miss Elizabeth Wright will be bridesmaid. Mr. William Morrison will be the groomsmen. The wedding will take place at the home of Miss Cambron's parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Cambron, in Baker Street, at 9 o'clock in the evening.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander of New York, who has been spending the summer in California has been the honor guest at a number of luncheons given recently. Mrs. Frederick Sharon entertained for Mrs. Alexander last week, as did Mrs. James Flood and Mrs. Russell Wilson.

Mrs. Charles R. McCormick gave a luncheon last Wednesday for Mrs. Lewis Lapham, who is visiting here from the East. The guests who attended Mrs. McCormick's luncheon, which was given in Atherton, included Mrs. Andrew B. Hammond, Mrs. Florence Cole, Mrs. John R. Merrill, Mrs. Latham McMullin, Mrs. Evan Williams, Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mrs. Roger Lapham, Mrs. Harry Bates, and Mrs. Augustus Taylor.

Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Miss Aileen McIntosh and Miss Alice Requa gave a dance last Saturday evening at the Menlo Country Club. The guests of honor were the debutantes of last season. Preceding the dance the hostesses entertained at dinner. The guests at this latter affair were Mr. and Mrs. Dearborn Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth McIntosh, Miss Josephine and Miss Edith Grant, Miss Mary Martin, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Lawton Filer, Miss Frances Pringle, Miss Rosamund and Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Jane Carrigan, Miss Inez Macon-dray, Mr. Leroy Nickel, Mr. William Magee, Jr., Mr. Howard Spreckels, Mr. Richard Schwerin, Mr. Paul Kennedy, Mr. Harry Crocker, Mr. Orel Goldaracena, Mr. Stanley Armour, Mr. Tallant Tubbs, Mr. Charles and Mr. Samuel Dabney, Mr. George Tallent, Mr. Edward Pond, and Mr. Lawrence Requa.

Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker entertained at dinner on Friday evening for Mrs. Edward H. Harriman of New York. Those who were present included Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cary Rumsey, Mr. and Mrs. R. Penn Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. Averill Harriman, and Mr. and Mrs. E. Roland Harriman.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander entertained at tea on Tuesday at the Fairmont Hotel, where she has been stopping since coming to San Francisco. The tea was given as a farewell by Mrs. Alexander, who is leaving today for her home in the East.

Miss Caroline Madison gave a dance for seventy-five guests last Friday evening at the home of her father, Mr. Frank D. Madison, in San Rafael. A number of the guests entertained at dinner preceding the dance.

Mr. and Mrs. James Reid entertained at dinner on Thursday for General and Mrs. Charles G. Morton, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Murphy, and Mrs. John Biddle. The dinner took place in the Gray Room of the Fairmont Hotel. The guests were Colonel and Mrs. Robert Noble, Commodore and Mrs. James H. Bull, Miss May Colburn, Miss Elizabeth Huff, Miss Marion Fitzhugh, Mr. Wilfrid Bull, and Captain Harry Sepulveda.

Mrs. Margaret Buckbee entertained at dinner on Friday evening for Miss Laura Lindsay Miller and her fiancé, Mr. John Knox. Miss Buckbee will be a bridal attendant at the wedding of Miss Miller and Mr. Knox next month.

Mrs. William Kent, Jr., entertained recently at luncheon for her house guest, Miss Elizabeth Brandeis of Washington, D. C. The luncheon was given at the Town and Country Club. The following guests were present: Mrs. Dearborn Clark, Mrs. Lawrence Bowes, Mrs. Horace Van Sicklen, Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Miss Doris Schmiedell, Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell, Miss Adeline Kent, and Miss Alice Carr.

Mrs. George T. Marye will entertain during September at a dinner for her daughter, Miss Helen Marye. The guests will be the debutantes of the coming two seasons and their escorts.

Mrs. Barnaby Conrad entertained at a luncheon on Saturday for Mrs. Ord Preston of New York. Before her marriage Mrs. Pestron lived here with her father, General Charles Murray, U. S. A. Mrs. Conrad's guests included intimate friends of Mrs. Preston.

Miss Laura Lindsay Miller and Miss Margaret Buckbee were the honor guests at a luncheon given Thursday by Mrs. Theodore Rethers, Jr., in Palo Alto. The guests included debutantes of the past two seasons.

Mrs. Bowie Detrick will entertain at tea next Thursday for her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Charles Bowie Detrick, who is visiting in California from her home in Honolulu.

Major-General and Mrs. Charles G. Morton entertained several hundred guests Tuesday evening at a reception in their quarters at Fort Mason. This was the first formal entertainment given by General and Mrs. Morton since their return from their honeymoon a few weeks ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Dibblee entertained at a house party over the last week-end at their home in San Rafael. The guests were friends of their daughter, Miss Betsy Dibblee. The group were among the guests at the dance given by Miss Caroline Madison Friday evening.

Mrs. Seward B. McNear gave a no host barbecue dinner and dance Saturday evening at the Lagunitas Country Club. Fifty club members and their friends were present.

Mrs. Harry Whiting of Philadelphia was the guest of honor at a luncheon and bridge given Saturday afternoon by Mrs. William Moore at her home on Jackson Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Roger Lapham gave a dinner Saturday evening at their home in Menlo Park for Mr. Lapham's mother, Mrs. Lewis Lapham, who is their house guest. Fifty guests were present.

Hybrid Words.

A writer in Jack o' London's Weekly has written an amusing article on Franco-English exchange of words. This courtesy, though doubtlessly well meant, is often clumsy in effect. Says Mr. Roche, the present researcher, to give our French friends the floor, they have adopted many of our sporting terms quite unnecessarily, since their own words have exactly the same meaning as those they have paid us the compliment of borrowing from our vocabulary.

Paper-chase, crack, preliminary, canter, hammerless (in the case of a gun), cruising, round (of a pugilistic encounter), stand, race, to dope, brook, have one and all their French equivalents in rallye-papier, champion, galop d'essai, sans chien, croisière, reprise, tribune, course, droguer, and ruisseau. They have coined an extraordinary French verb in poulou, which, it is claimed, is the English for galloper, since it is said to be "derived," save the mark, from to pull up!

Un squarmouth will be a puzzle to many, although our Anglomaniac friends think it very English indeed, for do we not go on our travels with a square-mouthed kitbag? It was necessary for the writer to see a picture of a squarmouth, in an advertisement, to enable him to grasp the meaning of the word. Un smoking (our dinner-jacket) has long ago had the freedom of the ville de Paris and other towns, but dancings is of a much later date.

Rowing, which has held its own for many a long year, has fallen into disrepute, and l'aviron has once more come into its own, but le footing still foots its way along. Five o'clock simply means our afternoon "tea," as can be seen on the signboard—to name but one place—of an hotel at Garches, which informs the English-speaking tourist of the fact that there is "Five o'clock à toute heure." Hence, five o'clock means "to take tea." Most of us have eaten lilies in France without being aware why they were so called. They are our early rose potatoes; at first, the tuber was called l'early—the early—but it was subsequently surprisingly transformed into lirie, the article and the noun being welded, as in the well-known case of lierre, originally and correctly l'ierre.

A funny thing it is to hear a boy called Lili, but just repeat twice the last syllable of Charlie, as pronounced in French, and you have the explanation. It must, however, be borne in mind that Lili also represents Emilie. To come to ourselves.

We daily see in print en deshabille, or even en dishabille, which should be en déshabillé. Reveille is common in England, but not in France, where the diane is sounded in barracks at early morn. Le réveil, an abbreviation of réveille-matin, was formerly said, but it has long since given way to la diane. Double entendre, for double entente—meaningless in French—is dying a very hard death, for it has made its appearance quite recently, while morale, to designate the moral of troops, is, like the poor, always with us. Vive (for Vivent) les Anglais is, alas, too familiar with us.

One of the literary shrines of Italy was reported destroyed when the Fascisti set fire with incendiary bombs the famous "Byron Palace" at Ravenna, where the poet lived in 1819. The building, which was known in the middle ages as the Rasponi Palace and was one of the tourist attractions of Ravenna, is situated across the square from Dante's tomb, which escaped injury. The palace was reduced to ruins because it was used as the headquarters of the Socialist Coöperative Society. General strikes have been declared throughout the province of Romagna, in protest against the Fascisti, who continue to occupy Ravenna under martial law.

The oscilloscope is an invention which makes an engine working at high speed appear to crawl. It is now believed that a development of this device will enable the movements of a bricklayer to be followed by the human eye.—Punch.

Mrs. Lowenberg Complimented.

The monthly letter of the League of American Pen Women, issued by Mrs. Grace Geldert, national president, contains a paragraph recommending that every branch of the league adopt a resolution similar to one offered by Mrs. Lowenberg of San Francisco, as follows: "Be it therefore resolved that no books or pamphlets of a bolshevistic nature be allowed in the libraries of the League of American Pen Women or within the portals of their halls or rooms wherever situated, and that no publicity be given by the League of American Pen Women through their bulletin or other service to books or articles of an unpatriotic character." Mrs. Geldert adds that the position taken by the league in conformity with this resolution has been warmly commended by the Secretary of War and many other men and women "who stand by that bulwark of Christian civilization, the Constitution of the United States."

There is an animal cemetery in Montevideo, Uruguay, where elaborate monuments are dedicated to monkeys, dogs, cats, parrots, and other household pets.

CURRENT VERSE.

The China Cupboard.

The China Cupboard's gray
And cool tins shining day;
A hoard of age-old shadows steep
The narrow room in sunless sleep
Its flowered cups and dishes wait
In rows upon the shelf, with plate
And jug of blue design
And homely jam-jars in a line,
And wide, pale bowls where flowers spread
Their tracery of blue and red.

Here Sally comes in working-gown
And apron; here she reaches down
A bulging pitcher, rough and brown.
Into the sunlight then she speeds
To draw the water that she needs.

So Sally's self enfolds me round
With shadowless shadow and mute sound,
And it is very joy to find
The close, gay flowers of her mind.
Then she will speed this mood and be
Crisp light and windy gayety,
When all her thoughts will be as keen
As water, and as swift and clean.

—Iris Graves in the Nation and Athenaeum.

The Song of an Aeroplane.

Here let them hang, that hung full oft in air,
To flash, with following thunder, on the foe;
Here let them rest, that knew no resting there,
Till warped and withered, like the beams around,
they grow.

As dinted armor decks ancestral hall,
And war-worn memoried ensigns droop and fade
In vaulted aisle, so shall these vane recall Deeds, till our days undreamed of, in high heaven essayed.

These have adventured where no eagle yet
Has raised exalting plume, ay, far away,
Beyond earth's straining vision, have they met
A lonely challenge to a dread unwitnessed fray.

No trumpet pealed the signal for the fight (To many a deadly brunt these wings have flown);
No plaudits rose, that nerve the charging knight,
Where he that ruled their fury fought aloft alone.

And ne'er was honor grudged to foe that fell,
Before the rushing of these victor vane,
Whose measured throb beat out his dying knell;
No deed that earth defiled, the air's proud record stains.

—Thomas Thornely in the Observer.

Straws.

When the straws by the curbstone lie all the one way
You know very well what the log books will say—Hard winds in the Channel from Falmouth to Deal,
And tankers that ache through their coatings of steel;

Wind East by Northeast blowing sleet on the brine,
Slow tankers in travail from Humber to Tyne,
And captains that swear by the Lord they'd give thanks
For a barge out of Runcorn untroubled of tanks.

When with straws that are woven and ribboned you make
A screen for your head lest your eyeballs should ache,
You know very well what the log books reveal—
Blue water as smooth as the back of a seal,

And sun-mellowed captains who now seem to draw
All the sweetness of life through the stem of a straw,
Slowly sipping and sorry for all the poor souls
That sail between towpaths and telegraph poles.

When the straws from the nose bags slide over the roofs
You know there is thunder and dust of sea hoofs
From numberless nags that come cantering down,
And challenge the tankers to ride them or drown;

Then captains grow testy and can not sit still
As they dive to the hollow or leap to the hill,
And swear if they hadn't been fools they'd have stayed
To serve out the rum in a bar at Port Said.

When the straws are upright and a-rattle in rows,
You know very well what the log books disclose—
Wide waters all smooth and wide heavens all dumb,
And captains whose lives are all honey and rum;

For, filling their glass till they're half overseas,
The tanker runs on while they lie at their ease,
Full of pity for all the poor lads with no sand,
The limpets that hold on the fringe of the land.

At Del Monte.

The California golf championship, September 2d to 10th have taken on considerable social importance. Southern California is to be represented in larger numbers than ever before, and the north will turn out en masse.

The picturesque Del Monte Lodge, which is the starting and finishing point for the Pebble Beach golf course, where the championship matches are contested, will be the scene of many gay luncheon and dinner parties, and will also be interesting with afternoon teas. The golf clubhouse at Del Monte has always been a favorite luncheon place, and the hotel dinner-dance in the Palm Grill is popular.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, well known in New York and Eastern social circles, is one of the visitors enjoying the scenic beauties and out-of-door life at Del Monte. Young William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., has been at Del Monte with his tutor. Lieutenant-Colonel Harold L. Mack entertained recently at a dinner-dance in the Palm Grill at the hotel. Among his guests were Lieutenant-Colonel and Mrs. Robert A. Roos, Mr. and Mrs. Francis McComas, and a number of brother officers of Lieutenant-Colonel Mack's who are encamped at the Del Monte polo fields. Among the guests at Del Monte Lodge are Mrs. W. B. Schiller and her son, Mr. W. B. Schiller, Jr., Mrs. L. M. Masters and Mrs. W. McCall of St. Louis, Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Cate, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Staats of Los Angeles, Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Thomas of Pasadena, Dr. and Mrs. Leo Musser, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd C. Sturns, and Miss Lotta Bland of Oakland.

Mrs. William H. Crocker and her sister, Princess Poniatowski, are at the Crocker Lodge at Pebble Beach to stay over the weekend. Mrs. Crocker is showing Princess Poniatowski the points of interest at Del Monte and Pebble Beach.

Comparative Literature.

A German novel is a book in which two people want each other in the first chapter, but do not get each other until the last chapter.

A French novel is a book in which two people get each other right in the first chapter, and from then on to the last chapter don't want each other any more.

An American novel is a book in which two people want each other at the start, get each other, and then want each other clear through to the end.

A Russian novel, however, is one in which two people neither want each other nor get each other, and about this 450 profoundly melancholy pages are written.—Translated for World Fiction from Munich Jugend.

"Did your vacation do you good?" "You said it; I came home broke." Portland Express.

"When I was your age I had no thought of taking a wife." "But I don't want to take a wife; I want one of my own."—Life.

"Oh, mummy, we've had such a lovely game! There's an old gentleman asleep over there, so we've buried him."—London Opinion.

"I don't understand men." "What now?" "My husband ran a tank during the war, and now he can't run a vacuum cleaner for me."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"If the operation hurts you, don't blame me, but blame your nerves." "And if I hit you on the nose when it is over, don't blame me, but blame my tooth."—Munich Megendorfer Blätter.

Boss—Mr. Lindelof, I have forbidden all levity in office hours. Now, one of the young ladies has complained that you have kissed her. Mr. Lindelof—Which one was it?—Stockholm Kasper.

Movie Magnate—In your next production I want you to create an air of great luxury. Director—All right, I'll have the star pick an orchid to piece while she says, "He loves me; he loves me not."—Life.

"See the farmer boy," said the smart city slicker. "Well?" "I wonder if that yap has ever been anywhere?" "He's been in Germany and France." And that ended that.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Old Lady (who is opening an account—to bank manager)—Now I never put all my eggs into one basket, Mr. Smith, so I'm going to leave part of my money here and part in your Bayswater branch.—Punch.

Young Alderman—Just imagine, those rascally street railway people had the nerve to offer me a hundred thousand to vote for their measure. His Wife—Oh, Henry! I always knew you'd make good.—Life.

"Little Kitty is always stroking the cat. Does that signify that when she grows up she will be a lover of animals?" "No, I fancy it means that she will be fond of fur coats."—Munich Megendorfer Blätter.

Census Taker (to middle-aged spinster)—And what is your age, madam? Spinster (coily)—I've seen just twenty-five summers. Census Taker—How long have you been blind?—Minnesota Ski-U-Mah.

Daughter—The preacher just phoned and said he was coming to call this afternoon. Mother—Gracious! We must make a good impression. Give the baby the hymn-book to play with.—American Legion Weekly.

"Isabel," said mother, as she summoned her youngest into her presence, "has your brother Willie come home from school?" "I think so, mother," answered Isabel. "The cat is hiding in the woodshed."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Undergraduate (on the links)—Professor, did you see a meerschaum pipe with a round bowl? Near-Sighted Professor—Well, now that you mention it, Simpson, I did think that last shot of mine behaved rather oddly.—Judge.

"I suppose," said the society matron, "that you found many curious marriage customs among the aborigines?" "Yes," replied the explorer, "I did. I discovered one tribe where women were not allowed to change their husbands, nor men their wives."—Judge.

"I'll wager," said a clubman, as he entered the smoking-room, "that the man who ran his auto over our friend Juggins is sorry he did it." "Why are you so certain of that?" some one asked. "Juggins was wearing a scarf-pin that punctured the fellow's tire."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"What's become of Rantington Roarer, the eminent tragedian?" "He's playing small parts in the movies." "He used to say he'd starve before he'd prostitute his talents on the screen." "Maybe he did. He was considerably under weight when he signed up."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Joys of Socialism.

That Swedish socialism has a directly opposite trend to the socialism in the United States, so far as the wage question is concerned, is the finding of Dr. Hugh P. Baker, executive secretary of the American Paper and Pulp Association, who is now in Europe on a tour of investigation of the paper industry there, says the New York Times.

"Swedish socialism," says Dr. Baker in the course of a trade letter, "means a leveling down of the wages of the skilled worker to the earnings of the unskilled worker. In America socialism has meant leveling up the common labor to the standards of the skilled workers and the intellectuals."

"This is the striking difference that is manifest between socialism in the two countries to the observer of the trend of thought among the working class. The difference may be due to the Russian influence, for communistic posters are found on the walls of paper, pulp, and sawmills.

"The socialists are in control in Sweden and their efforts are devoted toward two things, greater government activity, even to actual operation in the forests and forest industries, and toward leveling down to the common laborer in wages, and incentives of course. Thinking Swedes recognize the danger of this trend in their efforts to maintain quality in their product as an essential factor in the retaining of world markets."

Names in Books.

It may be granted that the prolific author has an increasingly difficult task to find suitable names for the people of, say, his thirtieth book or play, says a writer in the Manchester Guardian. Meredith, in whom it is often possible to detect that he was refining upon Peacock, fell back a good deal on the frankly unusual—Mr. Ferbrass, Mr. Lespel, Mr. Tuckham, Captain Baskett, and Turbot (the journalist) are examples from the one book, "Beauchamp's Career"; but though they seem bizarre when detached from their place, in it they do not startle. One foot of Meredith was in the romantic camp where anything may happen to names; and an author whose license with names seems to exceed the allowable, even if in plays the post-name is more nearly legitimate than in novels, is Sir Arthur Pinero. Let one play, "The Benefit of the Doubt," not a romantic play, illustrate. Pustina Emptage, Theophila Fraser, Mrs. Cloys, Denzil Shafto, Peter Elphick, Mrs. Quinton Twelves. They are society people, and good names, thanks to deed-polls, are cheaper than good addresses, but such a collection of strange names is rather to caricature life than to attain that exaggeration of life which is art. It amounts to cruelty to children. Captain Marryat wrote "Japhet in Search of a Father" on the theme of the nameless child, and showed preoccupation with a similar theme in the jolly boys' book, "Percival Keene." Authors who take due care for the characters, their offspring, might recall the tribulations of the unnamed Japhet and the misnamed Percival Keene; they might spare their characters the desperate queerness of being called by names as regrettable as if they had been born to patriotic parents when the war was popular.

It is Mr. Monckton Hoffe who fairly outruns the constable. In "Pomp and Circumstance" he confronts us with a cast which includes Angelo Pageant, his wife Doria, Seymour Revelsent, and Asphodel Forrest! This is what leads to the theatres being called theatrical; it is to announce in advance that the play is remote from life; to paraphrase Judge Brack, "People don't have such names," or, if they have, it is bad art to collect them. We are, as Queen Victoria said, "not amused" when incredible nomenclature inhibits our will to believe in the credibility of the characters, and, apart from fantasy—where Lord Dunsany's inventions of sonorous Eastern names are unique—it is safe to stick to orthodox names, even if an author, as he goes on, must reshuffle old combinations. A sobering thought for the amateur of the unorthodox is that no baby is secure against being named after the admired figure in a popular author's work. Pity the rhapsodist's old age, embittered by appearances in the police courts of young persons whose distinctive names recall a "best seller" of twenty years ago.

The Proper Fleet Base.

It is an anomaly when a harbor has every advantage as a fleet base, and the fleet is based somewhere else. It is both a folly and a danger when the fleet is split into ineffective units and scattered among ports none of which is either properly situated or suitable in accommodation for defense. That is exactly what a foreign enemy would desire, and it is exactly what has been done with the Pacific fleet. San Francisco is centrally situated, its harbor is large enough to accommodate destroyers, submarines, mother ships, colliers, tankers, hospital ships and all other auxiliaries, it has an abundance of shipyards and drydocks, and it is surrounded by a larger population than any port on the Pacific Coast of America on which to draw for skilled mechanics and every other form of labor and service. Moreover, it is landlocked in a manner that the attempt on the Dardanelles proved impregnable. The southern harbors invite attack, and Puget Sound is partly foreign so that an enemy could bottle up and neutralize any American ships that war caught there. From this port the fleet could move with maximum dispatch to any threatened point on the Coast. In case of war, which we wish would never recur but know is as certain as any other phase of destiny, it would be necessary to concentrate the fleet on San Francisco Bay, if the enemy would kindly give us time. For that reason, if no other, the officers and men of the fleet should have an intimate familiarity with the Bay, with its climate at all seasons, with its geographical relations to all the Coast, and with the industrial resources and strategic values of the location. These considerations are in no sense repugnant to the spirit of the Disarmament Conference and the Four-Power Treaty. That spirit imposed upon us the duty of reducing armament, but not of being fools about our armament when reduced. We have the navy for national defense. There is no other reason for retaining any of it, and no reason at all unless it is to be effective. Under the policy of reduction, effectiveness is all the more necessary, and no considerations of politics or local interest should be permitted to weaken it further. All these arguments and more were impressed upon Secretary Denby, on the occasion of his recent visit to this city, in his conference with the Bay Cities Naval Affairs Committee. Napoleon's principle was to divide and conquer. It is the duty of the Navy Department to see that the present division of the Pacific fleet is abolished, that the fleet is henceforth operated as a unit, and that it is drilled and maneuvered in practical relationship to its proper strategic base.

Under Which King, Benzonian?

The railroad strike situation has got down to fundamentals. It is not now a question of wages, or seniority, or of any other matter of merely incidental import. Is the government at Washington supreme, or must it yield to the authority and the power of the labor unions? This is the issue; all else now is irrelevant. President Harding through his Attorney-General has spoken for the government:

The underlying principle is the survival and the supremacy of the United States. * * * No union or combination of unions can dictate to the American Union. * * * I will use the power of the country within my control to prevent the labor unions of the country from destroying the open shop. * * * When a man in this country is not permitted to engage in lawful toil, whether he belongs to the union or not, the death knell to liberty will be sounded and anarchy will supersede organized government. * * * When the unions claim the right to dictate to the government and to dominate the American people and deprive the people of necessities of life, then the government will destroy the unions, for the government of the United States is supreme and must endure. * * * There must be no coercion by letter, telegrams, telephone, word of mouth or interviews to be published in newspapers, to direct or command any person to abandon the employment of the said railway company. * * * No organization will be permitted to laugh in the frozen faces of a famishing people without prompt prosecution and proper punishment.

These utterances are incontrovertible unless it be conceded that there is an authority in the United States superior to the authority of the government.

In the face of these declarations the head of the American Federation of Labor declares that the unions "will fight." He asserts the right to disregard the commands of a United States court, thus endorsed by the government at Washington. The unions will, Mr. Gompers declares, defy the government.

Now we are to see if President Harding or Sam Gompers is the head of the republic. One is backed by the laws of the land and the mandate of the whole people. The other is backed by an irresponsible agency which sets up rules of its own making and the authority of its agents as superior to the authority and powers of the government.

Public opinion will determine the issue; and it is for every citizen to take his part in making the verdict. Men and brethren, where do you stand? Are you for President Harding and the supremacy of the government, or are you for Sam Gompers and for the supremacy of organized labor? "Under which king, Benzonian?"

Once before—in the year 1861—the authority and powers of the government at Washington were challenged. Eleven states of the Federal Union entered into a conspiracy to estop the processes of the government within their several borders. They called hosts of armed men into the service of the cause as they defined it. A bloody war followed and many thousands of men laid down their lives. That challenge to the authority and powers of the Federal government failed. So will this new challenge fail.

The Old Deal and the New.

The governorship of California, as compared with that of other states, is an office of exceptional powers. The "short-ballot" helps make it so. A scant half-dozen functionaries, whose duties are mainly of a routine sort, are filled by popular election, but the more potential agents of administration—most notably the all-powerful Board of Control—are appointed by the governor. Then we have a multitude of commissions whose members are named by the governor and with tenure subject to his favor. Associated with our numberless commissions are numberless attachés—lawyers, clerks, stenographers, messengers, laborers, chauffeurs, and last but not least, an army of high-salaried "experts." Of the thousands who in one service or another or through one device or another draw salaries from the state treasury—and ride about in 461 state motor-cars—all, in the philosophy of practical politics, are under obligation to the governor. And it is no accident that this is so. When Mr. Johnson was revising the state constitution ten years ago he was also building up a political machine—and he missed no tricks.

Another source of power as related to the governorship of California is the legislative practice of enacting all money bills without scrutiny. This is done under a rule of "courtesy" as between legislators. Each legislature passes up to the executive office a mass of measures appropriating money vastly in excess of the available funds; and it becomes the duty—and the opportunity—of the governor to arrange the budget in his discretion. In his judgment or at his sovereign pleasure he may give here and withhold there. He may reward or he may punish. A more effective means of disciplining members of the legislature or of placating communities could hardly be devised. All this obviously is at odds with the principle under which the power of the purse should abide in the legislature, leaving only the duty of execution to the executive office, but it is only one of many illustrations of the difference between theory and practice.

The Johnson machine, evidence of whose vitality we have just seen in last week's election, was founded in the powers of the governorship; and it has been maintained by the same powers. True, Senator Johnson and Governor Stephens do not love each other, but their concurrent ambitions led them to smother their antipathies. The one seeking continuance in the senatorship and the other in the governorship, they have worked together; and Johnson, being the stronger personality, has had the better of the partnership. In the late election, under influences mainly "under the table," the energies of the joint machine were exercised almost exclusively in behalf of Johnson and to the neglect of Stephens. Johnson is booked for another term at Washington, but Stephens goes sadly back to Los Angeles to resume business as a private citizen at the old stand. He has made no public moan, but one who claims heart-to-heart knowledge reveals to the Argonaut that if Mr. Stephens had the power to paint the moon it would be a "bloomin' sanguinary spectacle."

Mr. Johnson has held his machine in fair working order through a policy of cajoling Governor Stephens. But will he be able to make a deal with the prospective governor, Richardson? Those who are in the know of things say not. Richardson, while an amiable man, is essentially a lone-hander and he is no "dub" in the game of politics. While he once worked with Johnson, he owes him nothing. In his private affairs he has exhibited organizing ability; and there is further evidence of his skill in the recent campaign. We suspect that Johnson will not find in Richardson the complaisance and pliability that enabled him to use Stephens and the powers of the governorship to his own ends. In the campaign just ended Richardson stood opposed to the Johnson machine. In so far as it took heed of the contest for the governorship it was for Stephens. Richardson owes it no friendship. The score is the other way round. Thus, although Mr. Johnson came out of the recent campaign a victor, he stands weakened in his potentialities by the outcome. His machine, a dominating force for the past ten years, is now minus its fundamental prop, since the essential powers of political organization in California lie with the governorship.

The vitality of the Johnson machine has largely been dependent upon the prevailing riot of extravagance in state affairs. It has thriven upon multiplication of offices and lavish expenditure of public money. The theory has been that the taxpayer is a dumb creature without ability to protect himself. So it has been and so it would have continued to be if there had not arisen a champion of the principle of economy. Mr. Richardson appears in that character. Now for upwards of a year he has gone quietly about the state exhibiting the follies, the wastes, the graft of the system. He has pledged himself to reform the system—to disband the commissions, to cut the official roster, to demobilize the army of tax-eaters. This programme, if it shall be carried into execution, and we believe it will, can not fail first to weaken and ultimately destroy the machine. That which has been built upon extravagance can not be maintained under a régime of prudence and legitimacy in public expenditure—and that is what Richardson promises and what the taxpayers expect at his hands.

That Senator Johnson and his friends see a menace to the machine in the prospective election of Richardson is evident in their effort to put a rival candidate in the field. Mayor Rolph confesses that he has been urged to get himself on the ticket by petition, and he intimates that he has the matter under consideration. The motive is plainly in view. It is inspired partly by malice against Richardson, partly by the hope of throwing the election to Woolwine, the Democratic nominee. With a Democrat in the governor's chair the machine would lose its main support, and after a fashion it might be held together in the hope of future success and reward. From the machine standpoint a Democratic governor is much to be preferred to an anti-machine governor. While Mr. Rolph does not easily put aside any suggestion flattering to his political ambitions, he is in this particular matter a bit shy. And well he may be, for if now, after having participated in the primary, he should come out as a candidate it would be a shabby act—an act even shabbier than other things that he has done in times past. The sinister motive would be too evident. He could not hope for election. All that he could get out of a candidacy would be a little brief applause from radical supporters of the machine, and to this would be added the contempt of all fair-minded and right-thinking men. The contest for the regular party nomination was open and above board. The party has declared its choice, and with an emphasis that can not be mistaken or explained away.

The Bonus.

The five-billion-dollar raid upon the treasury of the United States and the earning power of the American people known as the Soldiers' Bonus Bill has passed the Senate with certain amendments, and, having previously passed the House, now goes to conference. Its proponents believe that it will be in the hands of President Harding within the next two weeks. If he signs it the raid will become effective next New Year's; which is not far off.

This bill passes at a time when nations, and industries, and society in general are in a restless, fevered state. The world is ill. Although the United States is better off than the nations of Europe, it is in no condition to assume a new and demoralizing burden. Business in this country is just struggling to its feet after the vast disorganization of the war; and not merely business as such, but that universal business of providing for the household and making the family income go as far as it will. No burden can be laid upon the commercial affairs of the nation, by imposing it upon the national finances, without its being felt, and severely felt, by the general body of the public; for in the long run it is the consumer that pays.

The country was under no obligation to take on this added load. Its obligation was to the maimed and incapacitated, and to the dependent survivors of those that gloriously died. As for those that participated in the European conflict, they had an education universities could not give; and an exalting experience beyond all price, which this bill purposes to reduce to terms of $1.25 a day, less the $60 discharge money already received.

On the contrary, Congress and the government were under the gravest obligation to lighten burdens to the taxpayer as far as that is humanly possible. Taxes are crushing in their weight, and the public is growing increasingly conscious of the fact and increasingly rebellious about it. We have just had a demonstration of it in California, where a campaign directed solely at that mark has resulted in the nomination of a comparatively obscure aspirant for the governorship. There is no other meaning to the startling success of Mr. Richardson. He defined and restricted the issue to that one point. Both the business men and the people in general are tired of the ceaseless demands put upon them by the government, and determined to force retrenchment. Mr. Richardson understood the matter, thereby giving evidence of his qualifications. The voters recognized the issue, and voted to make retrenchment the policy of the state; and President Harding would do well to regard that result of the California primary as an indication of the temper of the public on the sore subject of finance.

The President has said that he would veto the bonus bill unless it carried its own revenue-raising provision. He should have said he would veto it whether or no—because any revenue-raising provision that would work could work only in one way and that would be by taking the money out of the people; there is no other way for government to get money. But at any rate he has said it must carry its own revenue-raising method. He should and probably will stand by what he has said. The public expects it, and it is hopefully looking for something of the sort as an outward and visible sign of courage and firmness. President Harding is an amiable and a considerate man, but we have never on that account doubted that he possessed the requisite obstinacy—stubbornness if that quality be necessary—to discharge in full the high trust reposed in him by the American people, even to opposing a behest of the people themselves if it were manifestly to their hurt. And this bill would be to their hurt. The argument that "it will put money into circulation" is absurd. Not a dollar would be in circulation after it that is not in circulation now. Two-thirds of the money paid out through it if it were enacted would be received, like all easy money, as something dropped from the sky or a winning in the lottery, and would be spent for superfluities. It would, in other words, be wasted instead of being devoted to productive industry, and the ultimate benefit would not accrue to the intended beneficiaries. The burden would fall upon the taxpayer, and the only compensation he could ever hope to see would be an unhealthy inflation of trade.

The addition tacked to the bill on motion of Senator Simmons of North Carolina, providing that the interest on the foreign debt be used to defray the cost of the bonus is a fantastic, eleventh-hour effort to meet the condition laid down by the President. That money is all needed to redeem interest on the bonds of the government due its own people, or for the remission of war taxation. Used in that manner it will do more for business and industry than four times the amount dribbled out in fifty and hundred-dollar lots to abled-bodied young men who have survived unharmed the sublime test of patriotism and received the invaluable discipline of war. And it will do more for these young men themselves, for it will go far to reestablish industry on a normal basis and enable them the sooner to find their places in it. The foreign interest device does not meet the issue; it dodges it. It provides no new source of revenue, but merely appropriates an old one.

The bonus raid is a measure of public largess, on the bread-and-the-circus plan of catching votes in return for gratuities, or doles; and not for needed doles either. It is a bid for popularity, an essay at corrupting part of the electorate in a palatable manner. The President's veto is expected, even by the senators that voted for it, and it is awaited with eagerness by a public that is tired of the whole sordid subject, and would like to see it disposed of properly and for good.

The Bonus Debate.

Our veracious and thoroughgoing daily newspapers were too much taken up with the activities of Peggy Joyce, with speculations about the McCormick girl and her riding-master fiancé, with the latest news of Fatty Arbuckle, and other similarly important matters, to give attention or space to the debate which preceded the passage of the bonus bill by the Senate.

One of the notable speeches was made by Major Reed, the new and youthful senator from Pennsylvania. Reed is an ex-service man, having been several months at the front in France. Admitting that a majority of the ex-service men in the country favored the bill, Mr. Reed declared the belief that they were more anxious to see the public debt paid and taxes reduced than to receive the bonus. "I am not willing," he said, "in army slang, to pass the buck to the President, therefore I shall vote against this bill now."

Senator New said that the measure was in effect an insult to the soldier:

It is a gratuity, and no man ever accepted a gratuity without being the worse off for having accepted it. It is my honest belief that so far as the cash feature of this bill is concerned it would be money thrown away. It is insufficient in amount to accomplish any beneficent result that would be enduring, and at the end of a brief period of indulgence the only thing that would be left would be the debt that its granting would fasten upon the treasury.

Continuing, Mr. New pointed out that the cost of the so-called bonus which is provided by this bill will exceed the cost to the government of the whole civil war. This means the addition of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 to the public debt, which already approximates $23,000,000,000. It is impossible to create a public debt that leaves the shoulders of any man free from the burden it imposes. Its effect will be felt by those who are to be the immediate beneficiaries of this plan for a generation after they have lost all recollection of the pittance which the bill proposes to give them.

Senator Myers (Democrat) of Montana declared that the bill had been promoted by the methods of propaganda. He used, he said, to "think that Congress sat here and deliberated and in its judgment enacted legislation which it thought was for the best interests of the country. But I believe that idea has been largely superseded by the idea that if you want to get anything out of Congress you must institute propaganda and carry it on very extensively and very actively. There has been more propaganda carried on in favor of this legislation than any other legislation I have known for a good while."

Continuing, Mr. Myers contended that:

The country is in no condition to saddle upon the taxpayers an additional burden, variously estimated from $4,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000. I do not believe the business of the country, which is just emerging from a long and distressing depression and from a very stagnating condition, is in any shape to stand any such added burden at this time.

Senator Underwood (Democrat) of Alabama made comparison of the wages of the soldier with those of the mechanics who served at home in civil occupations:

A vast number of the young men who served in the army were not trained and had no profession. Many of them were farm boys. If you compare the wage received in the army after all of their expenses had been paid and allowances made for their families with the wage men got on the farm during the war I do not think there would be much difference between the two classes of men as far as actual compensation is concerned. Of course there were men in the ranks who made great sacrifices to be there. Nobody can contend that men of this class will have their compensation adjusted by our paying them an additional $625.

Proceeding, Senator Underwood said he could find no reason for paying a bonus to men who had come out of the service unscathed and capable of earning a livelihood. He would vote to care generously for those who had been rendered incapable, but he would not insult a man competent for self-support by handing out to him a petty dole:

We now owe $22,000,000,000 and it is proposed by this bill to increase that indebtedness by $4,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000 more. I think $7,000,000,000 is nearer the mark than $4,000,000,000. At any rate, it is proposed to increase the present indebtedness by passing this bill and making the aggregate nearer $30,000,000,000 than $20,000,000,000. What effect will that have on the national defense?

Senator Wadsworth (Republican) of New York in opposing the bill stressed its economic and moral effects. Referring to a statement by Senator McCumber to the effect that if the Bonus bill were not passed the young men of the country would not again rally to the public defense, "I have," he said, "no such opinions of the veterans of this war as would lead me to suggest such a thing either in public or in private. I can not comprehend how such a suggestion could have been uttered on the floor of the Senate or in any other place, indicating as it does a suspicion, or at least a fear, or a doubt at least, as to the loyalty of these men to their country and its institutions, indicating as it does that it would be wiser and safer in view of the possible crisis which might overtake the country for us to pay them an average of $300 or $400 as provided in this bill."

Senator Williams (Democrat) of Mississippi also denied the charge that the boys who went to the training camps or the war, and who returned to their homes uninjured, made "sacrifices":

When a young boy with warm blood in his veins answers the call of his country, whether as a volunteer or as the subject of the draft, and goes out to fight for civilization against military autocracy, I scorn the suggestion that he has sacrificed the number of days, months, or years that he has devoted to that purpose. That it has placed him at an economic disadvantage with his fellow-citizens all history proves it is not true.

Senator Colt (Republican) of Rhode Island commended the bonus in a brief and colorless speech, merely declaring it to be a "matter of equity."

Senator Sterling (Republican) of South Dakota opposed the bill on both economic and patriotic grounds. In summary he said:

The bill ought to be defeated. First, on the ground of precedent; second, on the ground of the country's needs otherwise; third, on the ground that the ex-service men can get along without it; fourth, on the ground of the bad example it will set and the evil consequences that may flow therefrom in the future; fifth, on the ground that the terms of the bill itself are iniquitous in that they violate sound business principles and invite prodigality and recklessness on the part of the beneficiaries or supposed beneficiaries of the bill.

Senator La Follette, political nondescript of Wisconsin, was ardently for the bill. His only objection to it was that it "made too meagre provisions for our soldiers." He argued that there would be no difficulty in raising the money. He would restore and increase the excess profit tax, and increase the tax on large incomes and raise the inheritance tax on large fortunes. His idea was to cinch the rich "without burdening the industries of the country."

Senator Borah opposed the bonus on grounds both moral and economic. Further, he denounced it as a mere vote-seeking scheme. A striking sentence in his argument is as follows:

A modest offering to the millions of service men is a poor palliative to more millions who may be out of employment. Stabilized finance and well-established confidence are most essential to restore industry and commerce.

Senator Lodge (Republican) of Massachusetts favored the bonus, but did not engage in the discussion. In all twenty-three senators took the floor in the debate, which, while broad in its scope, did not present considerations not previously made familiar to the public.

Editorial Notes.

At last we are to be revenged on G. K. Chesterton. W. L. George, John Cowper Powys, and the rest of the tribe of transatlantic critics and lecturers. Our own H. L. Mencken has gone to England. May he return with some part of what they took away. The literary balance of trade must be redressed.

Wine production on a commercial scale still goes on actively in California. The total of commercial stock on hand the first of July in Southern California alone aggregated 21,371,820 gallons. According to Mr. Goodcell, collector of internal revenues for the southern region, production so far exceeds withdrawals that the supply is increasing at the rate of 3,485,843 gallons monthly.

Secretary of the Treasury Mellon reports that the deficit in governmental expenses for the present fiscal year will probably run to the tidy sum of $500,000,000.

If on top of this situation there should come the tremendous demand in the bonus bill the situation of the national treasury would be pitiful indeed. The hope is that President Harding will put the executive kibosh on the bonus. Aside from other objections, this measure is in direct and flagrant contempt of the pledges under which the present administration came into control of the government. It was the distinct promise of the Republican party to reduce taxes, and that may not be done with the bonus added to the national financial budget.

President Harding's ship subsidy proposal is in the way of going over to the next session of Congress. The present Congress has on hand too many things to take up now a subject of this importance. Furthermore, Congress is loath to act upon the proposal with a general election just ahead. But the President has in no manner altered his purpose. He has come to the fixed judgment that by no other practicable means can the American flag be maintained on the Seven Seas. Thus believing, he will use all the powers of his office to secure the enactment of a measure embodying substantially his previous recommendations.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

An Englishwoman's Protest.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD,

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, ENGL., July 29, 1922.

DEAR ARGONAUT: In an April issue of the Argonaut your Vanity Fair writer deals hardly with the culinary efforts of the average Englishwoman. Admitted that fancy cooking is not our strong point, there are one or two pertinent excuses. First, that up to very recent times domestic labor was cheap and efficient and there was no particular reason for the mistress of a house of the well-to-do class to cook. Now it is only the very modern houses which are built with the labor-saving devices that almost every American establishment has as a matter of course. In these the American housewife is able to cope with quite respectable menus without being handicapped and daunted by sulky coal stoves built in coal-strikeless days, of antiquated hot-water systems made apparently to run another sort of cold water, long stairs, and all the paraphernalia and clutter of the period when hands were more employed than brains.

Vanity Fair says, too, that she (I am sure it is a feminine pen) doubts if we could produce teachers in England capable of teaching this most useful of all arts. Well, I fear her knowledge is very much of the past—that nebulous region that evolved the mother-in-law joke, the effete aristocracy, and the elastic-sided-booted Englishwoman—or that her experiences while in this little island were terribly unfortunate. However, let her still hope, as domestic science (i. e., cooking, laundry, and general housework) is now on the curriculum of state schools and most of the voluntary ones; very admirably done, too, by certificated, intelligent women who have made it their life work.

I believe that the next few years will see a great improvement when the new poor are able to afford more modern labor-saving aids and can concentrate their energies. Englishwomen have excelled in their gardens, so why should they not, now that the necessity is upon them, in their kitchens? Hands that have wielded the spade will not be ashamed to brandish the spoon. I fancy even now, man for man and woman for woman, that England could show a cleaner slate for dyspepsia than America, and perhaps this is because of our simpler breakfasts which Vanity Fair casts in our teeth. Comparisons are odious, and most nations eat the food they enjoy and which suits them and their particular climate. The average Englishman feels unfit for the day after a breakfast of what he would call "messes," and the same shudder of horror apparently overtakes his American cousin at having tea for that meal. Let us therefore eat garlic in France, oil in Italy, chilis in Spain, and, if need be, rotten fish in Siam, in the happy faith that the native knows best.

PHYLIS A.

Concerning an Old Landmark and a Proposed New One.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 20, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Do you know of the Lincoln School Association, of which I am a member, and to which only youngsters of fifty years and up are eligible? They dine together once a year—on February 12th—wear their school clothes and endeavor by song, recitation, and reminiscence to imagine themselves schoolboys again. The teachers who are still with us are also invited. Every year until recently a "first reader" was auctioned and often reaucted to help swell the fund that the "boys" had been collecting, with which to erect a Lincoln Memorial, a replica of the statue that stood in front of the old Lincoln School on Fifth Street and that was destroyed in 1906.

The fund grew so slowly that it was decided to pool it with a similar fund that the local civil war veterans were collecting. This occurred a few years ago and a committee was appointed from both these associations, plus James D. Phelan and James Rolph, Jr., our mayor. Now what I am afraid will happen is that either one or the other the Jimmies will, when the fund is big enough, use his influence to give the job to some friend of a friend of a political friend, as I understand was done in the case of the Lincoln statue that was presented to England by the United States and which was so bad that it was afterwards replaced by a replica of the Lincoln by Saint-Gaudens.

The "boys" who for sentimental reasons would like the old school statue reproduced forget that this feeling will not survive them, although the statue will. Why couldn't we get permission to copy the Saint-Gaudens, and thereby insure to our city a recognized masterpiece and in addition save the cost of a design competition?

Then as to the location. I hope that it will not be in the Golden Gate Park, where it will likely be placed in company with a miscellaneous assortment of more or less amateurish effigies of the more or less great.

I should favor a spot nearer the centre of town, such as Union Square or the Civic Centre, where it could be seen daily by tens of thousands. A LINCOLN SCHOOL "BOY."

It is now said that the financial troubles of German communities mean the end of free schooling in Germany.

THE UNIFICATION OF CHINA.

Situation Appears to Be Working Itself Out Through the Processes of Historic Evolution.

China comes nearer being a united country today than at any juncture in her affairs since the Empress Dowager was overthrown and a republic established in 1911. The situation is working itself out, through a sort of natural evolution such as war sometimes assists. The condition from which the country is emerging should be understood, and can be understood from an easy American illustration, but the solution was one for time alone to bring.

Can you picture the United States being run by the governors of the forty-eight states, electing themselves by the votes of their respective national guards, keeping them under arms when funds are obtainable—money taken from taxes and revenues that should go to Washington? The situation in China, with its eighteen provinces, has heretofore been somewhat analogous. China has the largest army in the world today: a million and a half men who receive $10 Mex a month—sometimes. The military governors, or Tsuchuns, have fought each other until they are, through defeat and elimination, approaching unity. The only fighting now going on is between Ching Chung Ming, and the remnants of Sun Yat Sen's army and followers in the vicinity of Canton. Wu Pei Fu has been in Hankow, 600 miles up the river from Shanghai and geographically half way between Peking and Canton, where he has tried to appease the anti-northern factions of Hupeh, Honan, and Szechuen provinces, the Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky of our civil war days.

Right here let us kill the thought that there is a civil war in progress in China, as it has been so misnamed in the press of America. The two main factions, the northern or Peking government and the southern or Canton government, have never fought each other. They can't, because they are too widely separated. The fighting has all been between provinces or within a province, until Wu drove Chang out of the north. With the elimination of Sun Yat Sen and Chang Tso-lin the greatest obstacles to the reunification of China have been overcome. Only minor unorganized factions in a few of the provinces are now endeavoring to carry on their independent governments and monopolies.

The eighteen provinces of China proper constitute the republic, as a homogeneous possibility. Five distinct countries comprised the old Chinese empire—Tibet, East Turkestan, Mongolia, Manchuria, and China proper—and are now looked upon politically as comprising the Chinese Republic. When the various provinces with their different languages, coinages, and governments begin to function along lines that somewhat resemble a republic (say 10 per cent. as effectively as the forty-eight states of the American union) it will be time enough to consider the vast deserts, plateaus, valleys and mountain ranges of the other four countries, of which the white man knows little: an almost treeless, roadless, railless, wireless empire of double the area of China proper, and one that can be traversed only by camel pack-train.

It is well for any American—including those who have lived in China—to study the map before discussing her reunification. Nature has created tremendous handicaps in the path to progress of this vast area. Taking a quick glance at these outlying domains, we must understand that Manchuria is virtually Japanese territory today. Turkestan and Mongolia, where they are not mountainous, contain large deserts. Here wild dogs and horses still roam; a fact which we can hardly appreciate sitting by our home firesides. It is only within recent years that a Caucasian has boasted of approaching the forbidden shrines of Tibet.

The outcome of the present situation in respect to personalities in the government of China is anybody's guess. Hsu Shih-chang, who was president after Yuan Shih-kai died, is out, and Li Yuan-hung, who was vice-president under Yuan Shih-kai, is president—temporarily.

Yuan Shih-kai was a military leader and succeeded to the presidency through his power as commander-in-chief of the Chinese army. Upon his death, Li Yuan-hung became president. Though he was the general in charge, in succeeding to the presidency he failed to hold his position of military power when the Tsuchuns revolted in 1917, and Hsu Shih-chang became president. Hsu was ousted through the military diplomacy of Wu Pei Fu, the present military leader, who has done more to reunite China than any other man. Chang Tso-lin, who has been openly financed and assisted by the Japanese, has been called the "Uncrowned King of Manchuria," but he was "crowned," to use a slang expression, when he was defeated by Wu in one of the most strategic and decisive battles of recent Asiatic history.

Chang Tso-lin is still the war lord of Manchuria; there is no denying that. He controls the northern end of the Peking-Mukden Railway, even though the minister of communications in Peking issues orders to the contrary. But when Chang was driven north of the Great Wall and away from Peking by Wu he was eliminated as a possible military leader in China proper. What he and Japan will do and are doing in Manchuria is another story.

Now take a jump to Canton, a thousand miles south as the crow flies, but a great deal farther by steamer. There is no railroad connecting north and south China. On the map, Peking is opposite San Francisco and Canton is opposite the tip of Lower California. Sun Yat Sen has been the undisputed ruler in South China. He even claimed to be the rightful president of the republic. Sun is a Cantonese, and as the Chinese in America are nearly all Cantonese we have had a distorted view of him and his efforts. It is possible that Sun Yat Sen will be offered a position when the new cabinet is formed, as he has a certain following that should be united. In the meantime he maintains a house in the French concession in Shanghai, where his spoils of government are safe from the hands of any rival faction. As soon as Wu Pei Fu eliminated Chang Tso-lin (who was in sympathy with Sun Yat Sen) in the north, Chang Chung Ming took Canton, and is now the military leader of Kwang Tung province, in which Canton is located. Ching Chung Ming is a northern sympathizer, but if his political ambition becomes too great he may assume the powers of military governor of Kwang Tung—and who could stop him as long as the money held out?

Thus we have a kaleidoscopic view of the situation. Is it better to disband the armies and deprive the Tuchuns of their power, or unite them under one strong head? Both policies have adherents. When armies are routed or disbanded in China they become roving bands that plunder and kill. When a Tuchun attains undisputed power, he generally does likewise. A real leader, who could properly direct the efforts of the armies and at the same time keep them fed, clothed, and contented, could accomplish wonders if he were let alone. China has her own way of working out her salvation. At the recent Washington Conference a Japanese official asked Wellington Koo when he thought his country would be in a position to govern herself. Koo's laconic reply is famous: "China has been governing herself for the past 4000 years." The Grecian and Roman and German empires have risen and fallen while China carried on in her own way. In the meantime it is for us to dictate what she shall or shall not do?

The Washington Conference accomplished much for Chinese welfare of which the Chinese people know little and care less. Great Britain has abandoned Wei Hai Wei. Japan will evacuate Shantung. That is, she will officially withdraw her troops with strings tied to the withdrawal, but leave many citizens and business men (ex-soldiers well trained) behind her. She leaves the curse of her recent monopoly, and in the opinion of many Occidental observers has forever ruined Shantung as a white man's country.

The British, Japanese, and Americans have agreed to withdraw their postoffices January 1st (something we had no international right to establish), and a commission is working on a plan to raise the custom's duties from 5 per cent. to 12½ per cent. Nearly every commodity in or out of China pays a 5 per cent. duty today, most of which goes toward paying the interest on the Boxer indemnity to England, France, and Japan. It will be recalled that America remitted her share of the Boxer indemnity long ago, with which China established an educational fund to send her students to American universities.

Do the countries with interests in China want to see this peaceful four-thousand-year-old nation united? Japan, no. England, France, Portugal—all of whom have colonies or concessions in China—well, the only answer is that for the first time in history all these nations recently gathered around the table at Washington in their first show-down. All were supposed to lay their cards on the table—but did they? America played trumps with her disarmament cards, and thereby sacrificed her ability to maintain the open door. The gate to Manchuria is locked, and the key is in the Imperial Palace at Tokyo.

If the so-called New China Spirit ever permeates farther inland than twenty-five miles from the coast there will be some hope of awakening the hordes of the interior. If China should arise in her wrath her word would be law. But will she? We can not see it in the light of her history for forty centuries.

A united China would help business, which is what the foreign nations are most interested in, next to obtaining concessions. Otherwise China can take care of herself.

WARREN MANLEY.

SHANGHAI, August 10, 1922.

Corporal André Peugeot, who was killed on August 2, 1914, by a band of Uhlans at Jonchery, France, thirty hours before the declaration of hostilities, has been recently honored with a monument as the first victim of the world war.

The first transatlantic ship under the German flag to make a regular call at Boulogne since the war was the Antonio Delino from Hamburg, which recently embarked passengers and mails for Buenos Aires.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Pleasant A. Stovall, former American minister to Switzerland, has been awarded the gold medal of the Belgian government for war work among prisoners and refugees. Mr. Stovall recently received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of Georgia.

Mme. Curie is reported to be hard hit by the wave of economy that has struck the French government. The abolishment of 50,000 government positions does not leave her famous radium laboratory unscathed. One of the most serious obstacles the discoverer of radium has always faced was the shortage of qualified assistants. It is now urged in the interests of science that some philanthropist forward the few hundred dollars needed annually to keep Mme. Curie's staff at even its present inadequate proportions.

Professor Albert Einstein, exponent of the theory of relativity, has been blacklisted by the Deutsche Nationale party, who have marked him and a number of other leading German Jews for persecution. The Berliner Tageblatt, whose editor, Theodor Wolff, is also on the monarchists' blacklist, says: "Professor Einstein's continued concealment is advisable because the assailants of Maximilian Harden and Mathias Erzberger have not been apprehended. Professor Einstein's enforced absence is a blot on the German name and honor."

An authorized announcement has been made that all profits from Mr. Lloyd George's memoirs will be devoted to war charities. The British premier is publishing his account of the great struggle to counteract the many partisan pamphlets and articles aimed against his direction of the war. Mr. Lloyd George has made great progress in his history of the war during his holiday at Criccieth and expects to have the first volume ready for publication by early spring. Apropos of Lloyd George's decision to donate the proceeds of his book to charity it has been pointed out that he is a poor man practically dependent on the income of about $10,000 left him by Andrew Carnegie.

Miss Willa Cather has the honor of being the only woman included in the group of five Americans "who have appeared above the literary horizon in the last ten years" as chosen by some fifty leading American critics in response to a question put by the Literary Digest. Miss Cather was born in Winchester, Virginia, in 1876. She was educated at the University of Nebraska, where she received her bachelor's degree in 1895 and her doctorate in 1917. Miss Cather was on the staff of the Pittsburgh Daily Leader from 1897 to 1901 and was associate editor of McClure's Magazine from 1906 to 1912. She is the author of "April Twilight," "Alexander's Bridge," and "My Antonio," the last of which Heywood Broun has declared the best American novel to his knowledge.

Cardinal Cagliero has been awarded the Grand Cordon of the Order of St. Maurice by the Italian government and the decoration is causing more troubles in the papal army. The honor bestowed by Italy on a prince of the church has revealed the fact that while decorations of other governments, including the German and Austrian war crosses, may be worn in the Vatican by members and troops of the Papal Court, the ban against wearing those of Italy still exists. The Pope allowed Cardinal Cagliero to accept the Italian decoration and it is believed will now make a new dispensation allowing him to wear it. That is where the trouble starts, for the Italian veterans of the world war who have enlisted in the papal gendarmes want the same privilege extended to them, while the aristocratic corps of Noble Guards are opposing such exception being made to the old rule established when Italy took Rome from the Pope. The Pope, it is reported, has the question under consideration.

Sir Basil Zaharoff, as he appears listed in the British "Who's Who," or Zacharie-Basile Zaharoff, as he is sometimes known on the Continent, is Europe's man of mystery, and according to some British statesmen the power behind the premier's chair. Sir Basil, who enjoys the distinction of his English title presumably in return for his immense war services, is among other superlatives claimed to be the richest man in the world. But not by himself, for the extraordinary character about whose early life the most that is known is that he is part Greek and part Russian takes his love of mystery and incognito to a fanatic degree. Sir Basil Zaharoff, who is said to be about seventy-two, tall, slender, with silvery hair and moustache, is a banker by profession and one of the most powerful of international financiers. He is supposed to have given Greece, his mother's country, an allowance of two and a half millions annually during the Balkan war and half that sum during the world war. He has paid for new Greek legations lest his mother country seem shabby to strangers and he is credited with having financed the rise of Venizelos. It is because of his foreign origins that many Englishmen, despite his generous contributions to their government, consider him unsuitable for the post of adviser to the prime minister—a position which he nevertheless denies enjoying. From the outset of the world war the Germans considered the capture of Zaharoff of first importance. He nevertheless evaded them and continued his work as a munitions director—a post which undoubtedly brought him into contact with Lloyd George. According to Le Journal des Hellènes Sir Basil is a director of the Crédit Lyonnais, a director of the Barclay Bank in London, stockholder in numerous steamship lines, grain elevators, and theatres, owner of vast Near Eastern properties, and half owner of the Monte Carlo Casino. In addition to these possible connections he is the known head of the Vickers-Maxim munitions plant in England. Despite his English title, Sir Basil is a French naturalized citizen.

Drifting.

My soul today
Is far away,
Sailing the Vesuvian Bay;
My winged boat,
A bird afloat,
Swims round the purple peaks remote:—

Round purple peaks
It sails, and seeks
Blue inlets and their crystal creeks,
Where high rocks throw,
Through deeps below,
A duplicated golden glow.

Far, vague, and dim,
The mountains swim:
While on Vesuvius' misty brim
With outstretched hands
The gray smoke stands
O'erlooking the volcanic lands.

Here Ischia smiles
O'er liquid miles;
And yonder, bluest of the isles,
Calm Capri waits,
Her sapphire gates
Beguiling to her bright estates.

I heed not, if
My rippling skiff
Float swift or slow from cliff to cliff:—
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise.

Under the walls
Where swells and falls
The bay's deep breast at intervals,
At peace I lie,
Blown softly by,
A cloud upon this liquid sky.

The day so mild,
Is Heaven's own child,
With earth and ocean reconciled:—
The airs I feel
Around me steal
Are murmuring to the murmuring keel.

Over the rail
My hand I trail
Within the shadow of the sail.
A joy intense,
The cooling sense
Glides down my drowsy indolence.

With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Where summer sings and never dies,— O'erleaved with vines,
She glows and shines
Among her future oil and wines.

Her children hid,
The cliffs amid,
Are gamboling with the gamboling kid;
Or down the walls,
With tipsy calls,
Laugh on the rocks like waterfalls.

The fisher's child
With tresses wild,
Unto the smooth, bright sand beguiled,
With glowing lips,
Sings as she skips,
Or gazes at the far-off ships.

Yon deep bark goes
Where Traffic blows,
From lands of sun to lands of snows:—
This happier one
Its course has run
From lands of snow to lands of sun.

O happy ship,
To rise and dip,
With the blue crystal at your lip!
O happy crew,
My heart with you
Sails, and sails, and sings anew!

No more, no more
The worldly shore
Upbraids me with its loud uproar!
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise!

Three Loves.

There were three maidens who loved a king:
They sat together beside the sea;
One cried, "I love him, and I would die
If but for one day he might love me!"

The second whispered, "And I would die
To gladden his life, or make him great."
The third one spoke not, but gazed afar
With dreamy eyes that were sad as Fate.

The king he loved the first for a day,
The second his life with fond love blest;
And yet the woman who never spoke
Was the one of the three who loved him best.

THE ITALIAN FACTOR IN EUROPE.

Edgar A. Mowrer Depicts the Character and Leanings of the All-Enduring Nation.

Considering the number of persons that have tried in vain to find a formula for immortality, it is no discredit to Edgar A. Mowrer that he has not presented us, in his "Immortal Italy," with the specific reason why Italy is immortal, and hence that he has probably disappointed those patriots whose desire is an order of society that will never die. But that Italy is "immortal," or at least has been thus far, and seems destined to be for some time to come, is not easy to gainsay. Like the testy mountaineer whom the tenderfoot asked if he had lived there all his life, Italy could truthfully reply "Not yet." But probably she never would, because she is not laconic. On the contrary, Mowrer finds it in the Italian nature to be tediously logical and explicatory. They have the reasoning mania. "No one ever accepts an order or follows an instruction without a preamble of logic. . . . Your cook must explain the burning of the roast in terms of syllogism, or more often of an enthememe. The tailor has not finished your suit a month after it was promised because 'in the first place . . . in the second place . . . in the third place,' all solemnly shown on his fingers and with appropriate gestures." From which it may be inferred that Mowrer knows his Italy; but not that he does not love it and the Italian people. He does. He treats his grand theme with sympathy and affection, for which, however, he can hardly expect much appreciation from Italians if this paragraph presents a faithful image:

For all his shrewdness, the average Italian is completely taken in by praise and hyperbole. Tell him he is a good fellow and you like him; he remains cold. But call him a noble Roman, the legitimate child of Latin virtue and civilization, the younger brother of Dante—announce that his country, his army, his customs, his women, his intelligence, his nobility of soul outshine those of other countries as the sun the moon—and he's yours. He can not help it; even though he knows better, it goes to his head. In the popular mind foreigners are divided into friends of Italy, who are expected to express themselves in this tone, and enemies of Italy who are known by their failure to praise.

Nor are the Italians likely to forgive him for a certain hard brilliance with which he has treated the characteristics of individuals and nation; and although it is fine reading, clear-cut and to the point, in part exquisitely incisive, one of the very best of the current analyses of peoples with which it is sought to illuminate the European fog, one wonders whether its boldness, its sharpness, its frankness, and many another quality that is a virtue in the eyes of the analytical Anglo-Saxon with his mania for the whole truth, may not grind a figurative knife or two for the author who has dared handle so sensitive and sentimental a subject with so much freedom.

The title would connote a longer perspective than the book supplies. Mowrer dismisses antiquity rather cavalierly, and soon gets down to modern considerations. Yet the title is justified, as characterization. For has any other country displayed the ability to come back that Italy has? Ruined, devastated, degraded in the Dark Ages until the population of Rome consisted of a few thousand dreary creatures who supposed the remains of former grandeur were the work of gods or demons, Italy finances the Renaissance, almost organizes and directs it, gives new art to the world, and moves to her place in the present through such genius as Dante, Galileo, Leonardo da Vinci, Marco Polo, Columbus, Galvani, Volta, Vico, Verdi, Mascagni, Puccini, Marconi—to say nothing of Cavour, Garibaldi, Mazzini and Victor Emanuel II. If power to come back demonstrates immortality, Italy is immortal. She has it in a degree to dim the war records of Battling Nelson and Willie Ritchie combined. Our author asks:

How can one familiar with the United States, with Great Britain, with Germany, found hopes on a moribund land of beggars and museums? Is it not a still greater marvel that, after 3000 years of preeminence, Italy is still alive, that it has kept its personality and reformed its nationality, that a renewed nation with its soil still heavy with coma should be breathing in what superficial foreigners had taught us to consider a graveyard? A country that can twice arise from the sleep that is brother to death deserves the epithet immortal. In the Italian power to come back is matter for comparison which might make the enthusiast of modernity a little skeptical.

There follows much light upon recent Italian events affecting her participation in the war, and her status since, including that strange, new phenomenon of the fascisti. In Mowrer's view, Italy was rather absorbed in certain jingoistic ambitions which had led her to so fantastic an adventure as the conquest of the Libyan desert, but had ignored other interests, and had almost to be dragged into the war. This is how it occurred:

The emotional nourishment of the Italian people during the first twenty days of May, 1915, was charged almost to the point of explosion. No people less used to effervescence could possibly have kept moderately sober under the influence of so many fizzing ideas and foaming emotions. The battle between Neutralists and Interventionists, Giolitti and Sonnini, Germanophile finance and Francophile democracy, was in full swing. No one could say positively whether Italy would enter the war. I had been told in Paris that her intervention was certain. At Quarto near Genoa I had listened while a short, bald-headed poet called D'Annunzio poured forth to a crowd weeping with delirium a torrent of rhapsodical rhetoric whose message was war. But the choice of the country was dubious.

Italy's leaders had no accomplished fact or immediate aggression to flaunt before their countrymen. To the best of my knowledge, no nation, consulted freely and individually in circumstances permitting patient reflection, had ever chosen war. And in Italy I was not in touch with the democratic and ardent patriots outside public office who were the greatest force for intervention. Among the persons whom I met, diplomats, business men, deputies, journalists, the soberer elements seemed committed to peace. They reasoned; against their reasoning the Interventionists opposed either dubious arguments about a short struggle or emotional declamation.

The book is filled with these stained-glass transparencies, wonderful in their vividness and color; but perhaps some portraits done in this hard and brilliant medium will give the best idea of the style. Has any one given us lately a better study of D'Annunzio than this?

English-speaking persons hold it axiomatic that a boaster must be something of a bluffer. To large numbers of Italians boasting is the becoming garment of great deeds. It takes a long time to realize that they can shelter their real earnestness behind verbal flamboyancy just as easily as Americans behind sarcasm or Englishmen under indifference. Where an American feels only histrionics, the Italian thrills with stiff determination and is excited to heroism. Thus Gabriele D'Annunzio represents to most foreigners an incurable wind bag, a consummate comedian and a picturesque nuisance. To the average Italian he epitomizes the longings of modern Italy. To his nation he is the peerless prophet of "Italianity," the master of the fiery Word, a "column of never consumed fire." He means to his nation the hypostasis of the national life—what Kitchener meant to the English or Roosevelt to Americans. Like them he has his opponents, detractors, enemies. To his followers he is all that man can hope to be—a poet, a soldier, a leader, a hero, a devil with the women—in short, "the greatest of the Italians."

To define, even to describe this man of many facets, is no easy task. A recognized poet at eighteen, he has been a successful journalist, society leader, novelist, has been elected deputy, and planned war flights over Vienna. Always he has remained a consistent though curiously limited artist. He has captained a serious nation in one of its highest endeavors. We think of an aged and somewhat decaying voluptuary, the hero of a thousand beds, and instead we find him at fifty-six directing a complicated undertaking in its least details, manifesting an unrivaled physical and intellectual energy. This is but the latest of his surprises; his has been a life of continual renewals. From the sensual, talented boy, eager for the obvious prizes of life, he passed to the disdainful superman, the philosopher meditating on his own death, the emotional voluptuary toying with ideas of suicide. The fleeing debtor became the intellectual lion of Paris. Then, at the age of fifty-two "the dandy put on a uniform, the poseur showed a contempt for death, and the voluble boaster a capacity for firm instant action."

As to Giolitti, the old master of Italian finesse since Machiavelli departed, Mowrer has this to say:

When Nitti fell, the irony of fate brought back to power that old fox, Giovanni Giolitti, the most cunning and successful of Italian politicians. The old man who had been hooted as a traitor five years before returned (June, 1920) with the unanimous consent of all parties. Every one else had tried and failed to bring back peace to Italy. Giolitti could at least bring the unruly bureaucrats to heel and make the trains run. He might even find a way to down the socialists and solve the Adriatic question, which was rapidly running the country to bankruptcy.

Giolitti returned—humiliating his chief opponents by appointing them senators—and with him his invariable formula: never face a strong opponent or fly in the face of public opinion; wait until the wind turns and then strike before he can recover. Accordingly the prime minister yielded to the Socialists at the time of the factory occupation, but with guile in his heart. "Giolitti," said the Italians, who have an uncontrollable admiration for cunning, "knows his chickens."

After the war, Italy became a hotbed of socialism. So far had the propaganda gone that the proletarian movement seemed ready to proceed on the orders and the programme of Moscow. The manifestations were all about, clear and unmistakable, taking such forms as these:

But social intolerance and general violence had no limits. In some districts it became dangerous to wear a monocle or ride in an automobile. Thenceforth all men were to be equal—all signori. Meanwhile anarchy, arrogance, and violence were the prerogatives of labor. A dispute between a street-car conductor and a passenger was answered by a twenty-four-hour general strike. A football game at Viareggio was the prologue to a two-day battle with firearms. Storekeepers accused (rightfully) of profiteering had their stores plundered. In several localities villas were sacked by armed mobs. General strikes isolated town after town, telephone and telegraph wires were constantly being cut. Registered letters went astray. Packages and freight were subject to the most impudent robbery. Trains ran hours behind time or not at all, according to the whim of the engineers. The garbage men in Rome struck twice in hot weather and for days the none too clean city stank with refuse; a terrible epidemic might easily have resulted. Anarchists freely tossed bombs and hand grenades about. Life became a sinister carnival. Each category of worker became a law unto itself. All authority had disappeared. Slight quarrels regularly ended in murder.

But the Italians would not be capable of "immortality" if they did not combine with their emotionalism and blinding logic some large measure of the pragmatic. Unfortunately for socialism, they took a look at it:

Giaccio Menotti Serrati, editor of the four editions of the Avanti!, went to Moscow to see if an Italian revolution was possible. The impression brought back from Moscow by the Italian delegates was simply disastrous. Soviet Russia was a land of "hunger, pestilence, and the gallows." If revolution meant reducing one's country to the state of Russia, the Italian socialists would get along without revolution.

And reaction took on a practical, effective form. It seems to have been thorough, and it disclosed at once an astonishing feebleness in the forces of red revolution, which appear to have relied mainly on noise and on taking society unawares while it seized the arsenals and the arms. Fascism promptly stopped that. And here is its picture:

In practice fascism proved to be "dynamically conservative," yet in theory it was and remained revolutionary. Its unquestioned founder, Benito Mussolini (born 1884), was formerly a red of the reds. His lieutenants were likewise rebels. Umberto Pasella and Agostino Lansillo had both been syndicalists; Michele Terzaghi was, like Mussolini, an ex-socialist. These men imparted a strong revolutionary spirit to the movement, which they proclaimed "republican in tendency." Temperamentally the early fascisti were similar to the advanced communists, equally opposed to liberalism, democracy, and pacifism, equally ready for a fight, exalting heroic violence in opposition to the current "worship of the belly." From their syndicalist origin they also derived their chief doctrines, the cult of the "productive forces" and the shifting of centre in the economic struggle from the field of distribution to that of production. By 1920 (though they did not yet come out as a political party) they had formulated a programme of some clarity.

They aimed to defend the nation and the victory against foreign aggression and bolshevik violence. This done, their task was to stimulate production. The enemy was not socialism, but the parasite, whether workman or capitalist. Whatever economic organization should prove best fitted to produce, that they would defend. They declared themselves favorable to the eight-hour day, all sorts of workman's insurance, cooperative management of public works and public utilities, a national council for production (not unlike a soviet), a tax on capital and heredity, the confiscation of church property and excess war profits, the reduction of the state powers and the bureaucracy. In foreign policy they were "aggressive." Hence the support of the Fiume raid and the scheming for "republican dictatorship." Mussolini has written: "The interest of the nation is above that of single groups and classes, even above those of a single generation." The arbiters of the national interest should be chosen, not from decrepit and corrupt pontificians, but from among young, daring, intuitive individuals with energy to govern, not afraid to use those violent methods the occasion might demand, but not necessarily pledged to lawlessness.

So instructed, the first fasci di combattimento remained practically inactive for nearly two years, their only accomplishments being the sacking of the offices of the Milan Avanti! and the support given D'Annunzio. Then, allied with the army in Venetia Julia, and with capital in Emilia, they began a real offensive on organized labor, recruited their numbers from among all ranks of respectability and, ceasing to be militia, assumed the aspect and tactics of "vigilantes."

What of present problems? Our author says that anarchy and personal ambition have taken every opportunity to play havoc with the national life. The government is nearly bankrupt, although the people are in the main prosperous. (There is a movement afoot to make Austria a loan in order to repel bolshevism from Italy's borders.) But there is a sad lack of discipline and control, and a "labor turnover" in cabinets that seems rather discouraging just now when stability is most needed. The way out is not easy. Fascism was a reaction against a revolution that had really been abandoned already, and so offers nothing progressive in a political sense, although its concern with production is the most rational thing in economics we have thus far seen emerge from the European wallow. Then there are high taxes, and the paper-money disease, both aggravated by extravagance. Foreign contacts are unfortunate and prospects limited. The treaty of Rapallo, which gave the country good frontiers and a protectorship of the Little Entente against a return of the Hapsburgs, was a creditable achievement, but did not settle the question of the Adriatic. Italy will never cease her efforts to get possession of the Slavic islands and the east coast of the Adriatic, and she must defend Trieste against Teutonic ambition, sure to aim at recapturing it. The condition of the peasants was improved by the war—Heaven knows there was room—but it will be long before they can do much to guide national affairs, and the parasitic bureaucrats, like those in America, are gaining rapidly on the productive elements. The people are thus being corrupted into leaning on the government, and the more they lean on it the more they hate it, for they see bureaucracy sapping economic life through higher and higher taxation, as in California.

An economic crisis impends, for Italy is in the fell clutch of her own fecundity. Her people breed too fast, and there is no room for the excess population without vast internal development or else that potent cause of more war, external expansion. And the government dawdles:

The older politicians seem to overlook the problem and the newspapers are full of exhortations to an impossible social peace. It is as though the butterfly were asked to spare the chrysalis or the snake the old skin from which it is emerging. The soul of Italy has grown too big for the old body politic and strives restlessly to break its bonds. Labor crisis and fascisti reaction had their origin in the irresistible spirit of the new times. New Italy wants to be better fed and educated and frets against the old-fashioned state paternalism. Already Italians are cramped for space.

Here lies the really important task of Italian diplomats. This is to obtain, somewhere, somehow, scarcely populated territories whither the stifled population of Italy may emigrate and breathe. Within twenty years Italy may well number fifty million inhabitants—more than France, on a poorer territory only half so large; as many as Great Britain, without Britain's wealth or industry; nearly as many as Germany! If arrangement can be made for the unhampered emigration of these multitudes into South and North America, or French North Africa, or the Near East, Italy may be able to continue her historical rôle as mediator—her vast humanitarianism and experience will enable her to precede the more narrowly nationalistic nations in the new ways of international cooperation. If no such outlets can be peaceably acquired, Italy will have no choice but to seek to obtain them by violent means.

Were the older generations of Italians immortal there would be little hope of betterment. But the young men, the war veterans and their younger brothers, the middle class and the best of the proletariat, are rebels. Discontent seems to be inciting an entire generation to overthrow the older men and their cynical indirect methods. The young are more patriotic, energetic, and practical than their elders. If they could, many would emigrate; since they must remain they demand a different world; less finance and more production; less paternalism and more soul. Inevitably the future is theirs.

So it seems, after all, that the immortality of Italy depends on the mortality of her elder statesmen. In that she is not unique.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending September 2, 1922 (five days), were $130,900,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $118,000,000; an increase of $12,900,000.

Although during the last thirty days the bond market has shown its normal summer dullness, dealings in bonds on the New York Stock Exchange have been somewhat larger than for the corresponding periods of the last three years. Prices have been well main-prefixed to their serial numbers so that they are readily distinguishable from notes not called. At the same time, in connection with the refunding operations, an issue of United States Treasury notes was offered dated August 1st and maturing September 15, 1926. They bear interest at 4½ per cent. and $345,000,000 were issued, with additional allotments of $142,000,000 in exchange for Victory notes.

The minister of finance of the Dominion of Canada has announced a similar refunding operation to the effect that $178,000,000 of the 5½ per cent. Victory issue of 1917, which mature on December 1, 1922, will be retired by the issue of convertible 5½ per cent. five and ten-year bonds maturing in 1927 and 1932.

Normally, at this season of the year, funds are moving westward in anticipation of crop-harvesting demands. Over a long period of years the effect of this seasonal demand has been a tightening of the money rates, beginning usually about the middle of June and reaching the peak in October. So far this year, however, time money and commercial paper have showed no tendency to advance and there has been no pressure on bond prices as might ordinarily be expected, says Forbes Magazine.

An explanation is found in the present level of commodity prices and the increasing supply of gold. Commodity prices are sufficiently below 1920 levels to require a substantially smaller volume of credit in order to finance an equal volume in turnover, but have rallied far enough to liquidate large amounts of outstanding obligations and contribute to the general credit supply. Gold has been shipped into this country steadily for two years until total holdings of the Federal Reserve System are now in excess of $3,000,000,000.

Federal Reserve note circulation totals a little over two billions, and loans and discounts, including rediscounts at Reserve Banks, of 800 member banks reporting, total slightly under eleven billions. The margin between actual requirements and possible limits is so wide that a tremendous increase in demand for accommodations could take place before any real strain would be apparent. Of course, if inflation began to recur in an acute form it is probable that rediscount and other rates would be advanced in an effort to check it, but there seems to be ample credit accessible for legitimate business needs.

Under the circumstances, bond prices are likely to hold their own. Any marked reaction will not come until it is necessary to divert capital from investment to commercial channels, and of this there is no imminent prospect.

Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé general 4s, 1995, are attractive at a price to yield about 4.32 per cent. Outstanding to the amount of slightly over $150,000,000, they are highly secured by first and other liens on 8514 miles of railroad and by deposit on securities. Fixed charges have been earned by a wide margin under all operating conditions and current earnings equal two and a half times all charges, despite extraordinary maintenance expenditures. These bonds can not be retired before maturity and offer one of the safest permanent investments in the railroad group.

Kennecott Copper Corporation 7s, 1930, may be bought to yield about 6.30 per cent. They are outstanding to the amount of $15,000,000 and are secured by pledge of 500,000 shares of Utah Copper capital stock, having a market value of over $32,000,000. Kennecott is one of the world's lowest cost producers and is one of the few copper companies which could operate throughout 1921. Great possibilities lie in the Braden properties in Chile and in Mother Lode. This bond shows a high yield and is attractive where a short-term investment is acceptable.

The quantity of cotton cloths exported from the United States in the fiscal year just ended showed a material increase over the preceding year and a big gain when compared with the pre-war average. The value of course showed a decline, for the average export price per yard in the fiscal year 1922 was but about one-half as much as that of the immediately preceding year. The quantity exported in the year ending June 30, 1922, says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York, was 613 million yards against 556 millions in the immediately preceding year, but the 1922 value was only $77,000,000 against $141,000,000 in the year preceding. The quantity exported increased 10 per cent., while the value declined 45 per cent. The average export price of the cloths sent out of the country in the fiscal year 1922 was 12.5 cents per yard against 25.4 cents in the fiscal year 1921.

This increase in the quantity exported in 1922 occurs, says the Trade Record, especially in the Orient. China alone took over 30,000,000 yards against 12,000,000 in the preceding year, and the Philippines 87,000,000 against 43,000,000 a year earlier. To Asia and Oceania as a whole the exports of the fiscal year 1922 were 162,000,000 yards against 96,000,000 in the preceding year. To Europe, the great cotton goods manufacturer outside of the United States, the total in the year just ended was 40,000,000 yards against 20,000,000 in the fiscal year 1921. The one grand division which showed a marked decline is North America, to which the exports of the year were but 239,000,000 yards against 279,000,000 in the preceding year, and practically all of this fall-off occurs in the shipments to Cuba, to which the exports in the fiscal year 1922 were but 30,000,000 yards against approximately 90,000,000 in the year preceding. These figures of distribution are exclusive of about 50,000,000 yards for which destination is not yet shown in the official reports of 1921 and 1922.

Stripped of the pretty promises that its supporters make for it, the so-called Water and Power Act discloses provisions which make it so dangerous as to condemn it to overwhelming defeat at the hands of the thinking people of California at the general election next November.

Such phrases as "power at cost" can not obscure the fact that this proposed amendment invites the people of our state to place a $500,000,000 mortgage on all the property they have or hope to acquire and then to turn over this huge sum to a board of five men whom they can neither select nor control.

Friends of the "act" can not hide the fact that it would make all the property in the state responsible financially for the acts of this super-board. They can not hide the fact that all the people in the state may be taxed to pay the interest on these $500,000,000 of bonds—at least $25,000,000 a year—and to make up any deficits or defaults that may be occasioned by the dishonesty, incompetence, or poor judgment of the overlord board of five.

The little groups of theorists who are attempting to force the Water and Power Act on the people of California can not conceal the dangers of placing in five men powers so far beyond any ever granted to any man or body of men in the history of democracy. Praise of the proposed amendment can not obscure the fact that it gives to five men a power greater than the power of the people—a power to build in California a huge political machine that will control the state.

If the so-called Water and Power Act could possibly accomplish everything its advocates claim for it—and to assume that it could is absurd—it would not benefit one iota the people of California, where power, on the average, is already cheaper and more plentiful than anywhere else in the world.

We have nothing to gain by this proposed amendment; there is nothing to make worth while the tremendous risk of heavy loss and ruin that the experiment in state socialism would entail.

To read the "act" is sufficient to prove its utter impossibility and its great danger. It should be defeated at the polls by a vote so overwhelming as to protect us against such rash schemes in the years to come.

Five or six special trains will leave Chicago September 30th carrying the major part of the delegations from the Atlantic seaboard and Mississippi River points to the

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $100,000 Hayden Lake Irrigation District (a municipal district), Kootenai County, Idaho, serial 7 per cent. bonds, exempt from Federal income tax, due serially from July 1, 1933, to July 1, 1942, to yield about 6¼ per cent.

These are bonds of an old municipal district organized in 1913 to take over the privately-owned system which had efficiently furnished water requirements for the previous fifteen years. The district is almost entirely in a high state of cultivation and productivity. The bonds are a prior tax lien, ranking ahead of mortgages and other private liens, including mortgages securing Federal Farm Loan Bonds. The average value per acre is $252.34 and the bonded lien only $49.38, the ratio exceeding 5 to 1.

The district enjoys an excellent market for its agricultural products in the numerous resorts close by and Spokane is only thirty-vate operation of the roads. Under government operation the number of employees rose 261,548, or 16.2 per cent. The pay-roll increased 86.3 per cent, showing that the increase of numbers and of pay meant reduced efficiency. The average wage rose to $1453.25.

With the return to private operation, the railways were thrown upon themselves to produce wages and profits. Both had to be earned in a period of reduced traffic. The only possible source of profit was to reduce costs. The operating ratio was reduced from 94.38 per cent. to 62.74 per cent., the employees were reduced by 351,000 and wages by $862,000,000. The net operating income in 1921 was 3.08 per cent. on the property investment, or more than was earned by government operation under better earning conditions. The improvement in earnings continued in 1922 until the strike came. For the first five months of 1922 net operating income was 4.36 per cent. From September, 1920, to May, 1922, the entire period since the cessation of government operation, the average rate of return was 3.42 per cent.

Labor disputes and controversies with the resulting strike situation have necessarily hampered business, nevertheless there are many counterbalancing favorable influences, say McDonnell & Co.

The government's forecast of bumper crops for the United States overshadowed, to no small extent, conflicting strike developments. In the past big crops have always had a most decided effect on business activity and have really been the basis of our eras of prosperity.

For the fourth time in history, the corn crop promises to exceed 3,000,000,000 bushels, this together with a record crop of hay, the fourth largest crop of tobacco ever grown, an 805,000,000-bushel wheat crop and a 1,251,000,000-bushel oats crop, should bring great prosperity to the country.

There will undoubtedly be a tremendous increase in the purchasing power of the farmer, and railroads as well as all other lines of industry will benefit from the excellent crop conditions.

Building throughout the country reached the unprecedented high level of $1,700,000,000 during the first half of 1922 against $1,063,500,000 for the 1921 period. An unusually high proportion involved small operations with 40 per cent. residential in 1922 against only 22 1/4 per cent. residential two years ago.

While railroads and public utilities are doing only essential construction, and big industrial building is small, nevertheless the inquiries for estimates on larger operations are appearing in greater volume. Actual construction along these lines, however, is delayed pending stabilization of the industry.

Manufacturers of brick, cement, and lumber are experiencing difficulty in keeping up with new business. Lumber production is rapidly approaching high figures of 1920, the banner year; and despite the record rate of Portland cement production, stocks of this material continue to fall off.

Trend of the tobacco manufacturing industry is favorable. Outlook is for a bumper crop produced at low cost, which should mean cheaper leaf.

Notwithstanding reduction in prices for finished products, manufacturers' profits are holding up fairly well. This is due to economies effected and lower prices for merchandise other than leaf.

Two of the leading tobacco companies are running ahead of last year in net profits, and there are indications that the showing for 1922 will come close to 1921, which was the biggest year in their history.

Possibility of acquisition by American interests of control of French government monopoly for distribution of tobacco products has been revived. Two years ago $1,500,000,000 of American capital was marshaled for the undertaking. Negotiations, however, were not successful and Americans dropped the matter at that time.

The large increase in volume of traffic other than coal caused such figures to approach the best on record, and this was strongly reflected in the June earnings of our leading railroads. Moreover, except for coal, July traffic remained at a high level.

While the market has registered dullness during the past few weeks, railroad stocks have been gradually creeping higher and recently reached a new high price level for the current year.

All the evidence goes to show there has been a persistent though quiet accumulation of these issues even since the announcement of the shopmen's strike. This clearly indicates that, in the opinion of influential financial interests, the substantial improvement in the earnings of representative roads will eventually be translated into terms of the stock market, no matter what temporary obstructions are encountered.

The past month has been a period of great uncertainty as to how and when the railway shopmen's strike would be terminated, and at times there was an irregular movement in stocks, when prices in the entire market, especially in the railroad group, were subjected to a severe test by the prospect that a nation-wide tie-up of transportation might result from the spread of the strike spirit among the four big brotherhoods. Nevertheless, railroad issues continued to range from firm to strong, and a number of additional new high records for the year were made, notably by the New York Central, Chicago and Northwestern, Great Northern Preferred, Pere Marquette, Northern Pacific and Southern Pacific. Buying of high-class railroad stocks increased substantially during the month, and a considerable number of shares in that group went to the highest prices of the year, while there was an active inquiry for low-priced rails and the prevalent movement in these shares has been upward, say E. F. Hutton & Co. in their monthly review.

There has also been a general rise in prices of railway bonds, especially the so-called speculative issues, which gave a remarkable demonstration of strength by soaring to new high records for the year.

The failure of the latest negotiations in New York to end the shopmen's strike has given new impetus to the movement for Federal control of the railroads as well as the anthracite coal mines, but we are confident that President Harding will not undertake to operate the roads until they have been given ample time to make good their claim that they can operate close to normal, in spite of the strike, and we believe that in any event the operation of the roads by the government will not be undertaken unless general transportation is seriously obstructed. This we do not believe will happen if the men who have remained loyal to the railroads by refusing to join in an unjustified strike and the men who in the interest of the public have taken the place of the strikers are afforded the protection they are entitled to.

The Anglo London Paris Company is offering $380,000 Reclamation District No. 833, Butte County, Sacramento Valley, California, 6 per cent. serial gold bonds, due 1926-1931 inclusive, exempt from all Federal taxes and from all state, county, and city taxes in California except inheritance taxes.

The 1922 assessment roll of the Butte County assessor shows property to the value of $35,000,000.

With a crop output, according to census figures, of $1,500,000 from its 2200 farms, Butte is one of the important counties of the valley. Its steady development is indicated in the increase of 118 per cent. in the value of farms lands and farm buildings during the preceding ten years to an aggregate of $53,000,000, an average of over $21,000 per farm.

Butte County contains a great body of rich land, much of it already brought to a state of high development, notably in orchards.

Evidence continues to accumulate that the small investor of this country can and will supply the capital needed for the growth of American industrial, public utility, and railroad companies. The war taught people to save and invest. It also broadened their investment vision so that now foreign securities as well as domestic issues find a place in most investment lists. The United States has become a nation of investors. Where we had a few hundred thousand buying securities, now we have millions. The importance of this can not be overestimated. Changed from a debtor to a creditor nation by the fortunes of war, we are continuing to finance our own internal growth without calling upon Europe for capital, and, furthermore, we are loaning abroad to help finance the rest of the world, says John K. Barnes in the Century Magazine.

When income surtaxes went up during the war many feared that the sources of investment capital would be dried up—that the streams which supplied our corporate organizations with the funds they needed for continued growth would run low. For it had been the comparatively few large investors, outside of the insurance companies and savings banks which buy the more conservative securities, who had supplied the investment capital in this country. Those large investors were driven into the tax-exempt municipal bonds, yet the sale of corporate stocks and bonds goes on at a greater rate than ever before. Investment bankers report that their average sale has dropped from around $15,000 to about $3000, but their aggregate sales are larger. And in addition to taking more American corporate issues, these new investors are steadily adding a larger amount of foreign bonds to their holdings.

In the more speculative issues these new investors are not able to exercise the same discrimination that those of more experience might, and it is likely that some worthy enterprises may not be launched because those able to see their possibilities may not have funds available to risk in them, while other enterprises of no promise may be put across by the misleading of new investors as to their possibilities. But on the whole there will be less money lost in purely worthless promotions because the public by the Liberty Loans has been educated to think in terms of investment rather than speculation and gambling. The real cure for the blue-sky promotion evil is to get people to invest their money in good securities. Then the get-rich-quick promoter has less chance of tempting it from them.

It is doubtful whether investment bankers appreciate the advantage of this broadening of the investment base from a few hundred thousand investors to a few million. It is harder for them to reach millions than it was thousands; they must adopt new methods to do it. But they are going to find it of advantage to the companies whose finances they handled to have their securities widely distributed. It is going to result in a better public feeling toward corporate enterprises. At present the public is a large owner of se-quently antagonistic. This movement toward "customer ownership," started by Mr. A. F. was scored by the New York Telephone Company recently. In accordance with the new policy of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company to finance additions necessary to take care of the growing business of its subsidiaries by the sale of preferred stocks of those companies, the New York company offered $25,000,000 of 6½ preferred stock to its employees and telephone users. The amount was limited to twenty shares for each subscriber in order to get a wide distribution of the issue. In one day more than one hundred thousand people entered subscriptions amounting to $82,500,000. In the allotments no one got more than five shares, or $500 worth of stock. No bankers' commissions were paid and probably the company would not have gotten 107,000 new stockholders from among its telephone users had it done so. It was a remarkable demonstration of our new investment capacity, the depths of which our investment bankers have not yet sounded.

Our situation today is much like that of Great Britain after the Napoleonic wars. Those wars taught the English how to save and invest money. Before that they had borrowed from the Dutch to finance the growth of their industries. But with the overthrow of Napoleon they had found their investment pace and started their career as the bankers of the world. This position they held up to the recent war, when the opportunity came to us to take the position held by England for more than a hundred years. Whether or not we take it depends largely on our new investors.

So far the new investor is doing well. Some of the things he has done in the domestic field have been pointed out. In the foreign field figures compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and by the London Joint City and Midland Bank of London show that we are now taking nearly twice as many foreign securities as the London market. It is largely the buying of the small individual investor that accounts for this. In four months recently he took more than $500,000,000 of various foreign government, city, railroad and industrial issues. A contrast of this with the past is enlightening. When the Allies wanted a billion-dollar loan from us in 1915 not many people could see the advantage of it and the bankers could not see the possibility of floating it. It was cut to $500,000,000 and went with great difficulty; but when the money was spent here and American business began to boom, the advantage to us became apparent. The foreign loans we are now making have a similar influence, for only by increasing our loans abroad can we increase our exports of goods to foreign countries. Before the war we owed Europe interest on the money we had borrowed from it and we sent them goods in payment, capital and labor being employed at home in the production of them. Now that the war has changed us from a debtor to a creditor nation, we must either loan money abroad or take back more goods than we send out. The loans we make are largely converted into goods here, and it is the goods rather than the gold that we export. Thus do foreign loans engage American capital and American labor at home, and our new investors, by their greater purchases of foreign securities, are hastening the return of prosperity in this country.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Two poets deteriorate into prose in "The Return" of Walter de la Mare and "The First Person Singular" of William Rose Benét. Of the two, Mr. Benét comes through as the more plausible novelist, and that though he has less experience in the alien field of prose than has the author of "Memoirs of a Midget" and "Henry Brocken." Mr. de la Mare is the typical poet who writes prose poetically and may or may not improve it thereby according largely to the readers' taste, whereas Mr. Benét, excellent versifier though he is, has the more catholic potentialities of the trained newspaperman. As a novel, "The Return" (Alfred A. Knopf; $2.50) is a nightmare, not, however, without its ghostly and literary affiliations. It is akin to Mr. Onions' recent essay in horrors whose name mercifully escapes us, and like all the literature of the horrible it is Poe-esque simply by virtue of its morbidity. It reminds us, though it is not so well written, of Arthur Machen's "House of Souls" and so on ad infinitum. All which merely proves that in prose one had better stick to prosaic themes, since all the rest are inevitably a stripe. And notwithstanding, we should like to dub it "much ado about nothing." "The Return" is the story of a man who, having caught a chill in a trance in a churchyard, comes home with a changed countenance. Enough to make any one's face change, shrivel, darken, what you will. But Mr. de la Mare finds sufficient in it, or thinks he does, for several hundred pages of comment whose sole reward for the reader is the occasional chance encounter of a beautifully tipped and colored phrase the like of which one could find with less exertion in Mr. de la Mare's eminently satisfying verse.

"The First Person Singular" (George H. Doran; $2) has for its philosophic theme the survival of the fittest—socially speaking. The reader unaware of William Rose Benét's place in American letters as a first-class minor poet would never guess the truth from "The First Person Singular," a gently humorous, gay little novel with distinctly feminine touches. A greater contrast to the lugubrious use of a sledgehammer to drive a thumb tack sort of thing of "The Return" could not be well imagined. "The First Person Singular" treats such really serious vital subjects as wage-earning and social snobbery and small-town intolerance quite flippantly. The moral is that extremes meet in these two well-meant attempts of poets to write the more lucrative stuff called prose. In fairness, however, one must admit that "The Return" is the more serious and beautiful piece of work.

Readers of Baroness Aminoff's "Torchlight" books can not fail to wonder who this new luminary is. Despite her foreign name, she handles English with magnificent mastery. Some one has said of Conrad that, philologically though his knowledge of English is, he has never written a page that does not contain at least one phrase an Englishman never would have used. Not so with the author of the Napoleonic novels. Born in Helsingfors, Finland, in 1878, the daughter of Consul Emil Borgstein and an English mother, Constance Patterson, Léonie was educated in England and France and early acquired their tongues as well as her native Swedish. The Finnish poet, Topelius, was fortunately her godfather, and it was he who first directed her literary efforts. Her quiet married life on the estate of the Baron Max Aminoff was also conducive to writing, and it was there that her early novels, written in Swedish, were composed. They were published by Bonnell of Stockholm. Widowed in 1915, Mme. Aminoff devoted herself seriously to writing, this time in English, when the epic idea of a series of Napoleonic novels was conceived. Mme. Aminoff's working system is interesting. She prepares the ground very thoroughly by reading everything available on her grandiose historic theme, but the actual writing is done quickly, as any one who has read "Revolution" and "Love" (E. P. Dutton) can easily imagine. Not otherwise could that fresh vividness be obtained. Her own explanation is, "The pictures in my mind are like the sunset clouds, and vanish all too soon, but while they are there they are extraordinarily clear." Snared in print they are also extraordinarily clear.

If absolute candor were the acid test of fine work, the already famous negro novel, "Batouala," by René Maran, would be superlative indeed. Whether or not it is the utter frankness of its context, slightly camouflaged, we fear, by translation, there is certainly something remarkable and outstanding about "Batouala." In its perfect naïveté it strangely resembles the art that conceals art of our own decadent race. But one must not give too much credit to inspired savagery. M. Maran pays tribute in his preface to his masters, Henri de Regnier and Jacques Boulenger, and it is certain that he resembles in his metallic hardness the former at least. Nor is "Batouala" the spontaneous outburst of animal nature brought into contact with French civilization. Its author states that he spent six years over its careful workmanship—etching, he calls it. It is rather like al fresco paintings done in primary colors in the French manner of the premier coup. As a record of the pristine African life, fast vanishing according to its author, and of the quaint though deleted native customs, "Batouala" (Thomas Seltzer; $1.75) would be interesting alone. And as a study of the weird psychology of the black it is even more so, but as a lesson in stripping a subject of irrelevancy it is invaluable. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

London booksellers report that this summer they are doing better with guidebooks than they have since 1914.

"Success," by Lord Beaverbrook (Small, Maynard & Co.), is to be translated into Swedish and is already in wide circulation on the Continent in the Tauchnitz edition.

"Gods, Ghosts and Goblins," by Bertha Lum (J. B. Lippincott Company), is a beautifully illustrated and decorated volume containing a series of wonderful plates in full color and half-tone representing the charming or grotesque legends of Japan. The author is the foremost exponent of the Japanese in art. This work will be published in a limited autographed edition.

The Gaekwar of Baroda is one of the greatest Indian authorities on historic Oriental jewels. He is at work on a book dealing with the famous Eastern trophies whose material he has been collecting for years.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, though he is best known as a writer of prose, has written a good deal of verse, and published it, too. His three volumes are severally called "Songs of Action," "Songs of the Road," and "The Guards Came Through."

The Appletons report that six presses have been kept steadily running on "The Glimpses of the Moon" since a month before its publication date. A fifth giant edition has been rushed to press.

Paderewski has often been made flattering offers to write his reminiscences. Hitherto he has always declined on the grounds that he had things of greater importance to do. However, it is thought that he may now accept a publisher's offer recently made.

The publication of a French version of "Winesburg, Ohio," by Sherwood Anderson, has been discontinued in Le Gaulois, where it was appearing serially. B. W. Huebsch is the American publisher.

D. Appleton & Co. have published a timely book entitled "A Journey to Ireland," by Wilfrid Ewart. It furnished a frank picture of the present Irish scene.

"Some Distinguished Americans," by Harvey O'Higgins, is announced for early September publication by the Harpers. An actual personality is concealed in each of these seven portraits and all are said to be easily recognized.

Of the twenty-eight Houghton Mifflin Company books selected by the New York State Library for 1921 in their annual "Best Books of the Year" list, a few of the titles under fiction include Frederick A. Fanger's "The Golden Parrot," Denis MacKail's "Romance to the Rescue," Raphael Sabatini's "Scaramouche," Maud Diver's "Far to Seek," and Ian Hay's "The Willing Horse."

At the head of a particularly rich list of biography in the Houghton Mifflin Company's fall announcement appears "The Letters of Franklin K. Lane," Secretary of the Interior in Wilson's war cabinet. Next in the list comes "Glimpses of Authors," by Caroline Ticknor, descendant of three generations of well-known Boston literary figures; a "Life of Shakespeare," by John Quincy Adams; another of William Roscoe Thayer's inimitable biographies, this one of George Washington; "The Real Lincoln," by Jesse W. Weik, who concentrates on that little-known part of Lincoln's life, his career as a lawyer; an autobiography of Oscar Straus' service under Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, called "Under Four Administrations"; "John Burroughs' Talks," by Clifton Johnson; "The Wandering Years," by Katherine Tynan; a thrilling autobiography of Ralph D. Paine's adventurous life, called "Roads of Adventure"; "At Sea with Joseph Conrad" (on a British mystery ship), by its commander, Captain J. G. Sutherland, and the "Letters of Horace Howard Furness."

The English publishers of "If Winter Comes," Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, are still selling that popular publication at the rate of a thousand a day.

Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker, professor of history in Princeton University, has just completed an intensely interesting book, "The Planters of Colonial Virginia," in which he describes the sort of people who settled the "California: The American Period," by Robert Glass Cleland (John Howell, publisher), is a popular history of early California from the days when daring explorers and fur traders lived lives of almost unbelievable adventure through the riotous times of '49, the American conquest, and the recent amazing economic, political, and industrial development of the Golden State. A logical sequel to Dr. C. E. Chapman's "California: The Spanish Period," this new book points out the numerous factors which tended to weaken Mexican control over her distant province and emphasizes the primary importance in the history of California of its annexation by the United States.

In connection with J. K. Huysmans' novel, "Against the Grain" ("A Rebours"), Lieber & Lewis, publishers, announce that they have procured an introduction for the book by Havelock Ellis.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Pan and the Twins.

Some years ago a reviewer called Eden Phillpotts, a "pagan spirit in our modern world moving over the hills of Devon." His earth worship in that long series of novels in which he has painted his glorious part of southern England has immortalized him and it. His "Wild Fruit," a volume of poems, is full of a beautiful paganism. Now, in "Pan and the Twins," he is quite frankly, if with the most delicate irony, at one with the closing years of the ancient world. Taking a bit from Kingsley, Swinburne, Pater, he adds a reality and humor to paganism that is perhaps denied to those more serious, more convicted ancients. In pure sweetness and good nature "Pan and the Twins" would seem to answer that beseeching cry of many a critic to Phillpotts to produce something not tragic. His book replies, Go back with me into an age when men could be happy.

The piece is no mere idyl, however, but an artistic plea for tolerance. One of the twins is a pagan, the other a Christian. But though the Christian doesn't do much for the pagan, the pagan, assisted by Pan and love, very much improves the Christian. And in the end so highly do the Christian Emperor Theodosius and his saintly bishop think of the pagan that they let him live, in the face of the church militant. "Let us regard Arcadius as a picturesque and harmless survival of a happier age than ours," says the nice emperor.

Asceticism comes in for a good share of knocks, especially in Chapter XIII. "Good God—I'm in love!" cried the dumfounded hermit (in an earlier chapter); and he devoted all that night to penitential exercises.

In addition to the twins and Pan (himself), several delightful Roman ladies, two badgers, a bear or two and some bits of classically conceived scenery figure excellently in a story that is first of all, though we mention it last, a "rattling good story." Children will love it; adults appreciate it. Once more Eden Phillpotts reaches his high mark.

Sidelights on American Literature

Admirers of Professor Pattee's "American Literature Since 1870" will open his new book with eagerness, and they will not be disappointed. Professor Pattee is interested in Americanism in literature. In "The Age of O. Henry" and "A Critic in C Major," too, he would set O. Henry down a peg; he regards him and Mr. Mencken as master jazzers in our agony of jazz. O. Henry has his uses, says he, but let us not mention him with Poe and Hawthorne. As for the thorny bludgeon of Mr. Mencken, what does that effect but destruction? Yet there is hope for Mr. Mencken. The critic in C (one can't call it C minor) calls up the critic in C major to create something worthy of the American symphony.

One more modern engages Mr. Pattee—Mary E. Wilkens Freeman, namely—and a finely tempered essay he awards her. But its title is scarcely complimentary: "On the Terminal Moraine of New England Puritanism." "The Epic of New England," moreover, is a mournful piece, expanding Mr. Pattee's title in his earlier book—"The New England Decline." Yet he would have New England's epic, its one-time grandeur, celebrated—now that it is dead. To him the civil war killed North and South alike and gave birth to the West, and with the West to American literature.

Meanwhile he writes most illuminatingly of Poe's "Ulalume," and in "The Modernness of Philip Freneau" contributes a well-nigh faultless essay on a poet whose works he has himself edited in several volumes. Finally he studies Bryant as an eighteenth-century romanticist and Longfellow as an offshoot of the German romantic movement. He misses fire absolutely in his estimates of "Hiawatha" and "Evangeline," but a thesis is a thesis. "The young poet of the new century must sweat out Longfellow," concludes Mr. Pattee; "Whitman is our prophet of today." May we not, however, consider the matter open to controversy? Some of the younger choir may be harking back.

SIDELIGHTS ON AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Fred Lewis Pattee. New York: The Century Company; $2.

Some Milne Plays.

"Three Plays" is the title of the volume by A. A. Milne containing "The Truth About Blayds," "The Dover Road," and "The Great Broxopp." Of these three the one of most serious purport is "The Truth About Blayds," although no one is quite sure whether the author is satirically indicating the tendency of the average man to lies and hypocrisy, or whether he is just comfortably indicating that the law of expediency is the common path pursued, and we might as well make up our minds to it. At any rate in this account of an imposture—and a mean, low-down one, since the impostor stole the fruits of another man's brains and the fame that they earned—the author makes his family tacitly join in the imposition, and everything and everybody is comfortable when the play ends.

Mr. Milne is noticeably tender-hearted when it comes to the wind-up in his plays, so, in remembering that trait, we can but believe his ethics are not as faulty as some critics would believe, and that he is really a gentle satirist.

"The Dover Road" is a delightful comedy, old-fashioned in plot, modern in treatment. This account of the efforts of a rich and romantic eccentric to sever the destinies of elopers who are headed for unhappiness is animated by the spirit of Mr. Milne's singularly engaging comedy.

"The Great Broxopp" also has its individual charm and flavor, but we question whether the author will carry his public with him when he impoverishes "The Great Broxopp" because he is bored by his prosperous inactivity.

Mr. Milne is right. Broxopp will be much happier exercising his undoubted talents for making money than sitting in a corner of his newly-acquired baronial hall accumulating a fine case of Bright's disease. Yet so literal is the average person about prosperity that it is doubtful if the average reader can repress a rueful feeling when he sees the great Broxopp's fortune thrown aside in order to release its owner for fresh activities with his special talent.

What about carbon?

Chemical analysis shows that all lubricating oils are composed of about 85 % carbon and 15 % hydrogen in chemical combination.

All lubricating oils form carbon when burned in the combustion chamber. The important thing to determine is the amount and kind of carbon formed by the oil.

Some oils form a good deal of carbon, some a small amount; some produce hard, flinty carbon which will cause a great deal of trouble; others produce a soft, flaky carbon that will do no damage.

The important factors determining the amount and kind of carbon formed by a lubricating oil are the crude from which it is made, the process and care of refining it, its purity and stability.

Advantages of Crude and Vacuum Refining

Great care is exercised in selecting the crudes from which Zerolene is made, to secure only those which contain the most desirable lubricating values and at the same time as little as possible, if any, of the undesirable hydrocarbons such as wax and asphaltum.

In selecting crudes for Zerolene, the Standard Oil Company has the advantage of its own large production of practically every type of crude oil. For this reason the company is not compelled to use any particular crude because it happens to be the only one available.

These selected crudes, carefully refined by our own patented, high-vacuum process, produce in Zerolene, oil of the highest lubricating value, which, when burned in the combustion chamber, develop a very small amount of carbon of a soft, flaky nature, which can do no harm and usually blows out entirely with the exhaust.

THE ORPHEUM.

It is odd how chance is always sending a run of a kind on a vaudeville bill. This week there are half a dozen young men billed for patter, with occasional dancing trimmings. They are all brisk and lively, unless we except Frank Hurst, who, temporarily deprived of the accustomed support of a sick partner, revealed a marked tendency toward plaintive sentimentality. Frankie, for so comely a youth, inclined to sob stuff. He carols of desolation and had a long, homesick, heart-to-heart telephone talk with Ma, three thousand miles away, in New York. Some style about Ma, when it comes to paying her long-distance telephone bills. I have an idea Frankie writes his own stuff. It was fairly bulging with "darling mother," "lonely," "homesick," "don't leave me, honey," and so forth. However, Frankie, in spite of some breaks in his voice, came through, and won sufficient encomiums to make him dream, no doubt, wild, mad dreams of going it alone.

Tonie Grey does very good darky stuff in a hospital setting, and does it well. Likewise some limber dances with which he made a big hit.

De Voe and Lloyd gave plenty of amusing patter, and tickled the risibilities of the audience with their take-off on tough dancing. They spun their act out too thin at the last, however; a reproach which could not be leveled at Ernest Hiatt, an exceedingly lively and genuinely humorous raconteur and a sort of Mr. Malaprop who needs no partner to back him up. This young man was very wisely selected to fire off his artillery of fun following directly on the impression made by Theodore Roberts' intensely dramatic act. It was no slouch of a job to capture the hushed receptivities of a temporarily awed audience, but Ernest did. He has very good material; the kind that flatters an audience by challenging its quick recognition of funnysims.

It was something of a shock during a mood of tragedy to see a sort of human breeze blow on to the stage, but in a moment or so he had us all laughing so comely that, as must happen in vaudeville, the powerful effect left by the De Mille playlet was temporarily dissipated.

The Roberts piece is called "The Man Higher Up," and is a striking story of vengeance by mental suggestion on a white slaver who has deflowered an innocent girl under wantonly cruel circumstances.

Theodore Roberts plays the rôle of the German doctor who, with European subtlety, devotes three decades to injecting the poison of fear in the heart of the respectably placed scoundrel who had poured his pollution on the white flower of maidenhood that he—the doctor—had loved in his youth.

Mr. Roberts is an artist at make-up, as any one unfamiliar with his work before the camera could discover by the series of picture-play portraits of him in divers characters that were exhibited, as a preliminary to his spoken impersonation, thrown upon the screen.

He had greatly changed his physiognomy, and the foreign intonation, and the exotic touch conferred by the plum-colored, brocade dressing-gown, together with his actor's ability to submerge himself in a part, gave him a remarkable oneness with his rôle. And the deliberation of each successive movement, attitude, or remark completed the suggestion of an unsleeping vigilance toward vengeance that yet had an unmelodramatic reality to it. Perhaps the most noticeable feature in Mr. Roberts' striking portrayal was the series of expressions following each other on the doctor's face—the revival of past anguish, the glut of present vengeance, and the cold glitter of satisfied hate, as he pitilessly reviews, for his victim's enlightenment, the thirty-year-old tragedy; a fanatic in vengeance, but upheld by a sense of right.

Mr. Roberts had for support the excellent actor De Witt C. Jennings, who ably depicted the growing terror of the hounded victim.

It is certainly an unusual situation to see an avenger and his victim, barricaded against interruption, waiting for an infernal machine to blow up. But William De Mille can be depended upon to produce the surprise, and the outcome charged with psychological significance and dramatic power. This is one of the most notable numbers that we have seen for some time at the Orpheum, and possesses a drawing power that has been filling the house.

Be...des the attractions already mentioned, the Orpheum programme contained two musical features, one the Max Fisher Dance Orchestra, which pleases a variety of tastes, some of the strident order. But "At the Temple Gate" was played with pleasing Oriental color and suggestion and "Three O'Clock in the Morning" is the kind of descriptive music that delights a vaudeville audience.

Six dark-skinned brethren from the Philippine Islands plucked a lively series of melodies from their stringed instruments, the act being further brightened by the excellent dances of two Brazilians. Oakes and Delour having also opened the programme with a highly effective dancing act.

A FRENCH FLAPPER.

The flapper has appeared in French drama, the well-known writer of comedies, Maurice Donnay—assisted by the inevitable collaborator, in this case André Rivoire—being responsible for the appearance of this intrepid young radical in the conservative precincts of the French stage.

"La Belle Angevine" is the name of the play, the title being the nickname of, not a woman, but an elderly, good-natured, and exceedingly prodigal roué, who passes his prosperous existence in squandering large sums on a perpetual procession of chères amies.

Mongerey and his present chère amie have invited a gay crowd of irregular convives to witness "the hanging of the crane" in the gorgeous hotel in which Mongerey is installing his latest—pretty Huguette.

Mongerey, however, hurts the feelings of one of his decorators—a gentleman with a big head and little patience—by questioning the good taste of one of his most prized effects.

But a calamity happens when Mongerey pulls down the offending drapery and dances on it. Huguette, the mistress of the mansion, of the feast, and of Mongerey's affections of the moment, follows the incensed decorator with the illuminating statement that they are lovers; and Mongerey is down and out.

What to do? Why, get another girl, suggests his indefatigable friend and majordomo, La Vignole; get another one, any old or young girl, and save your face.

They confer gravely. For the hotel is ready, the feast is ordered, the guests are bidden, and there is no mistress to preside over the revels.

The indefatigable La Vignole comes to the rescue. "Il faut absolument trouver une femme . . . qui aurait de l'abattage, de l'entrain, qui se ferait tout, de suite remarquer par sa beauté, par sa grace, par son esprit."

Now we begin to hear the flapping of the flapper's wings. Brigitte, who has previously overheard on the telephone La Vignole's desperate efforts to capture a fourteenth guest who will take the curse off the fateful number thirteen, has come to volunteer. A stranger to both Mongerey and his devoted majordomo, both gentlemen at once remark her beauty and grace, as she explains herself, saying that she is not known at all, and that Mongerey has a "réputation de lancer les femmes," and that she desires only to be "lancé."

Brigitte makes it plain that she has no intentions on Mongerey's susceptibilities. "She is just a little nobody who wishes to emerge from her obscurity," and, while she admits that she has no social credentials she demurely reminds Mongerey that he does not exact the pedigree of his other guests.

At this moment Victorine, the maid of the fair deserter, Huguette, enters bearing a carton which contains the festal costume of Huguette. And then Mongerey has a bright and burning idea.

It is of course that the pretty stranger shall preside over the revels as their fair mistress. "Nous sommes dans un embarras cruel . . . c'est le ciel qui vous envoie."

All this exchange is characterized by the most exquisite politeness, there being just enough retreating and advancing on both sides to give vraisemblance to the eminently Gallic situation.

Brigitte, of course, after some doubts and hesitations over the unexpected prominence of her place during the fête, accepts. In the meantime the reader, or spectator, of the play, as may be, preserves a recollection of the fact that Mongerey's eminently respectable nephew—a scientist who feels a moral disapproval of his uncle's giddy career—is coming reluctantly to assist at the hanging of the crane, and something tells us that the adventurous Brigitte—who has made it plain that she prefers to be called "mademoiselle" instead of "madame"—has never trodden and does not intend definitely to tread the primrose path of dalliance.

Roger, of course, comes, and, as subsequently turns out, recognizes Brigitte as a fellow-student at the Sorbonne who has already implanted, unknowingly, a tingling little arrow in his receptive heart.

Skipping the complexities of the piece, and the very amusing working out of the plot, it follows, bien entendu, that Roger, after his terrifying doubts of the moral standing of the pretty Sorbonne student, finds that she is, as we perspicaciously suspected, perfectly straight.

For Mlle. Juliette d'Avernes at Mongerey's, but Mlle. Brigitte Reynaud in fact, a student at the Sorbonne, and a curious, independent, and amused spectator of life, is a flapper. And, when the fête is at high tide, and Brigitte, chic, elegant, with something, as she played her part, of the ingénue about her, dips a little below the surface in this "monde de la fête," she suddenly finds it horrible. All of Mongerey's guests ridiculed him behind his back. Few came for the social joys of the fête, for nearly every one had an axe to grind, and they all wanted to grind it on the palm of the elderly Don Juan upon whose profitable prodigality with money they counted.

And finally, when Mongerey offered to make Brigitte's temporary post a permanency, she incontinently slapped his face and fled.

And here we make another discovery. Since the war Maurice Donnay has written very little. But preceding this present epoch his name and fame were largely identified with plays, given in a tone of irony, and with an abundance of wit and natural gaiety, about illicit love. Morals scarcely figured in the plays of his youth, but, as the years went on, he wrote several pieces of a moral tendency.

And to this category belongs "La Belle Angevine." The wit and the humor are there, the light, amusing portraits of immoral people who live gayly in a world given over to pleasure, but the point of the whole thing is that Brigitte and Roger, offended and repelled by the atmosphere at Mongerey's fête, come together, drawn to each other in part by their repugnance for the life that Donnay has so often gayly pictured for the delectation of Parisians.

This play reminds us of another characteristic of French drama: the frequency with which married women, or ladies of irregular lives, figure as the leading female character because of the social restrictions thrown around the person of "une jeune fille bien élevée."

Roger never meets nor speaks with his pretty fellow-student at the Sorbonne until he encounters her as "une femme de luxe" at his uncle's. She got there because she was a flapper. Donnay does not call her one in the play, although La Vignole speaks of her as "une poule savante." But flapper she is, as she so reveals herself when she confesses her ingrained respectability to the enamored but skeptical Mongerey in exculpating herself for going, under such compromising conditions, to the fête at his house.

"I was curious," she says, "awfully curious. Even my going to the Sorbonne was part of this curiosity. I always thought that the world was just as interesting a subject for study as the subjects they offered at the Sorbonne. And then I got it into my head to be curious about the gay life of the underworld. It became an obsession with me, and when the opportunity came I couldn't resist."

No doubt this young French flapper is like many of ours. She fled from the crowning "saloperie" at Mongerey's fête. For these fearless, independent, busy, pushing, limitlessly inquisitive young radicals and extremists can not, in their fresh youth, stomach the strongly flavored pleasures which, as is probable, have palated on Maurice Donnay's Parisian palate. Hence, perhaps, the moral turn the veteran writer of light-minded comedies has given to his play, although custom and experience render him unable wholly to break away from pictures of the gay whirl of the milieu he knows so well how to limn.

MILLER IN NEW YORK.

There have been many items in Eastern papers as to which of the three plays that we saw the Henry Miller company act in this city would have the handkerchief thrown its way for presentation in New York. My choice, viewing the matter from a strictly business point of view, would have been "The Awful Truth," in spite of the interest attaching to Henry Bataille's "La Tendresse."

But "The Awful Truth" seemed safer, "Her Friend the King" being decidedly cut out by the wit and sparkle of the Arthur Richman comedy. There is no doubt, however, that both Henry Miller and Ruth Chatterton are greatly taken by their respective rôles in "La Tendresse"; so much so, on Miss Chatterton's part, that she has renounced the rôle of the piquant young divorcée in "The Awful Truth" in favor of Ina Claire—the comedy to be brought out at Henry Miller's Theatre on September 20th.

Playing as co-stars, Miss Chatterton and Henry Miller will appear in "La Tendresse" at the Empire, over which Miller's son, Gilbert Miller, is the presiding deity. And, it seems, rather than leave Blanche Bates unprovided with a rôle, the faults in "Her Friend the King" are to be eliminated by a process of revision, and the popular actress will again have the opportunity of flashing a considerable sartorial display on her public; an experience which even ladies who are as frank about the renunciation of youthful vanities as Blanche Bates is may well find agreeable; for it may be remembered that Blanche Bates' millionaire-widow clothes were so thrilling that they were becoming to the vivacious Californian.

There can be little doubt that Mr. Miller will have found it expedient to eliminate some of the atmospheric details in "La Tendresse," which would only interest a Parisian audience. That done, the play will gain considerable in quickness and compactness.

Mr. Miller likes the rôle of Barnac (if that is the correct name), and it certainly suits his methods, and gives him an exceptional opportunity. As to Ruth Chatterton, I feel convinced that she adores the rôle of Marthe, which allows for variety of mood, great emotion, and a departure from the usual; in America anyway.

It will be most interesting to notice how

Benefits of Co-operation

In the near future water from the Calaveras Reservoir will flow to this city through a new Spring Valley aqueduct and through the westerly section of the Hetch Hetchy conduit.

This will add 24 million gallons daily to the water supply of San Francisco, making the daily supply 66 million gallons.

In accordance with an agreement between the city and this company, San Francisco constructs immediately the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy line, extending from Irvington in Alameda County to Crystal Springs Reservoir in San Mateo County.

Concurrently, Spring Valley raises Calaveras Dam high enough to impound 32 billion gallons of water, and provides facilities to take this water as far as Irvington.

Spring Valley will "route" Calaveras water through its own line as far as Irvington, and through the Hetch Hetchy conduit from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

Spring Valley will pay the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds for the construction of the Bay Division conduit, and will also pay for the use of this conduit.

The city work and the company work will be completed together.

The paramount benefit of this co-operation between city and water company will be the augmenting of the water supply to meet the constantly growing needs of our expanding community.

A collateral benefit for the taxpayers of San Francisco will be their exemption from the burden of interest-payment on the bonds for the construction of the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy line—this burden being assumed by the water company.

New Yorkers take to the Bataille play. There seems to be a vogue in foreign plays recently; another factor, no doubt, in influencing Henry Miller to retain "La Tendresse" in his repertoire.

The play is rather a corker for Americans, even though there is no grossness in the treatment. But there is a subtle psychology in Bataille's masterly depictions of eroticism which will escape many Americans. He is—well, here is something said of him by a distinguished French novelist and essayist, which I found in a William Lyons Phelps essay, and which is most interesting. The Frenchman said that Bataille best represents "the moral anarchy and extreme refinement of intelligence where we now find the elite of an old people (the French) very artistic, very human, and very corrupt. I consider him," he continues, "as an enemy; I hope for the destruction of the society that he represents; but I recognize his art and his sincerity: he does his duty like an artist: he is true to life."

So here is an interpretation of one kind of French people, and it remains to be seen how well the American public will grasp it.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Postage Going Foreign.

The 2-cent postage stamp, representing in service probably the biggest value obtainable for the money, has extended its field of usefulness, says the Boston Transcript. It will carry a one-ounce letter to any postoffice in half a hundred foreign countries in addition to any one of the more than 50,000 post-offices in the United States, the many more in Canada, Cuba, and Mexico, and, of course, to any of the postoffices in American possessions overseas. The extension of the 2-cent rate to so many foreign lands is saving Americans, particularly business men, thousands of dollars annually in foreign postage, assisting in extending American trade, and, government officials believe, is tending to cultivate more friendly relations with foreign peoples.

The 2-cent rate was put into effect near the close of last year to Argentina, Brazil, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Jamaica, and Martinique. On March 1st this year Bermuda and Haiti were added to the list. Many Americans, it is believed, still use a 5-cent stamp in sending letters to a number of the foreign countries where the 2-cent rate prevails.

These countries now include Anguilla, Antigua, Argentina, Bahama Islands, Barbuda, Barbados, Bermuda, Bolivia, Buenos Aires, Brazil, British Guiana, British Honduras, British Virgin Islands, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Curacao, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Dutch West Indies, Ecuador, England, Grenada, The Grenadines, Guam, Haiti, Hawaii, Honduras, Ireland, Jamaica, Leeward Islands, Martinique, Mexico, Montserrat, Nevis, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, New Zealand, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Porto Rico, Redonda, St. Kitts, Shanghai, China, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Scotland, Tobago, Tutuila, Samoa, Trinidad, Virgin Islands of United States, Western Samoa, and Windward Islands.

The Cunard Steamship Company now have bookshops as well as libraries on their cross-Atlantic steamers.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Richard Bennett is to give San Francisco a taste of what the author, Edward E. Rose, is pleased to term a melodramatic farce, "The Rear Car." This piece with its startling complications while the car, attached to the Continental Limited, is on its way eastward in the night, is said to furnish as many laughs as thrills, and Bennett in the rôle of the "deflector," the man who is supposed to prevent crime, rather than detect it, offers a very unusual performance. The story of Ruth Carson, the railroad magnate's long missing daughter, was an unusual one, even before she boarded the eastbound train to be taken to her father. Once the car is in motion strange things begin to happen to Ruth Carson, Norah O'Neil, her traveling companion, and Alden Murray, the lawyer entrusted with the safe conveyance of the girl. And they happen with such utter strangeness and rapidity that the audience grows bewildered and then bursts forth in laughter over some ludicrous situation provoked by the "silly-ass" deflector, Sheridan Scott: the rôle played by Richard Bennett.

Besides the star the cast includes Violet Schramm, Clair Veda, Richard Cummings, Hugh Metcalfe, Franklin Pangborn, Jerome Sheldon, J. Morris Foster, Madeline Lubetty, Norman Feusier and John A. McGuire. "The Rear Car" starts next Monday night at the Columbia.

The final performance of "The Fool" will be given this Saturday night by Richard Bennett and the supporting cast.

The Players Theatre.

The revival of Sheridan's comedy, "The Rivals," featuring Evelyn Vaughan and William S. Rainey, at the Players Theatre, Bush Street near Gough, will close on Saturday evening.

Messrs. Travers and Rainey, who sponsored the productions of "The First Fifty Years" and "The Rivals," announce that a supplementary season of eight weeks has been decided upon, prior to the opening of the regular Players Club season late in the fall.

The next play to be offered, commencing Monday evening, September 18th, is Ossip Dymov's exotic and sensational drama, "Nju." Evelyn Vaughan will be seen in the title rôle, a part offering opportunities for her unusual dramatic gifts. "Nju" was produced in 1908 in Berlin by the famous Max Reinhardt at the Kammerspiel Theatre, and enjoyed great popularity in Berlin, Vienna, Paris, Zurich, Budapest, Petrograd, Moscow, and elsewhere. It found its way to the American stage when it was produced in New York recently by Joseph Urban and Richard Ordynski. This is its first showing in San Francisco.

"Nju" is a fresh treatment of an old theme, worked out, not in the usual acts, but in nine swiftly moving scenes. It will undoubtedly be a much-discussed play. Unusual settings and costumes in the impressionistic manner are being designed for the production by Ray Coyle.

"Pietv and Pie."

One of the plays to be given its initial performance at the Sequoia Little Theatre, 1725 Washington Street, which is to open its second season of one-act plays on November 4th, is an American novelty called "Pietv and Pie," by Blanche Cumming, a San Francisco girl.

The play attracted the attention of the director, Ruth Brenner, at one of the regular meetings of the Playcrafters in their Little Theatre Studio, 1625 California Street, and was chosen as the American comedy on the all-comedy bill to be presented this season. The beginnings of suffrage and mince pie, with other early colonial discoveries, are involved in the plot. There are two scenes, the witch-ridden Salem Wood, and the cottage of Dame Anne. The name Anne suggests the first American woman who asserted herself for reform, Anne Hutchinson. Blanche Cumming's play shows an easy way of accomplishing the reform, without suffering the inconvenience of banishment, as Anne Hutchinson did. That is where the "pie" comes in.

Miss Cumming's is the third local play to be given an opening in the Sequoia Little Theatre, and several others will be given later.

The Orpheum Next Week.

With the reputation of being the greatest delineator of "mother rôles" in moving pictures, Miss Vera Gordon is coming to the Orpheum Theatre next week in a stirring little playlet entitled "Lullaby." The same finesse and finely drawn portraiture of stage character are evident in this playlet as Miss Gordon gives in her picture characterizations. Here is an art with a deep and human appeal, and she interprets such parts with an understanding and intelligence that come only with the love of motherhood.

Miss Gordon, since going into vaudeville, has so arranged her work on the speaking stage as to enable her to continue screen work. It has been a common experience of hers to be playing in an Orpheum Theatre and in the same city seeing her own work exhibited in one or more moving-picture houses. This, of course, has a doubly good effect, for to see her in silent portrayal only makes stronger the desire to see her in person and hear the dramatic voice that has stirred auditors and held them in rapt attention in the legitimate theatres, where Miss Gordon first gained her popularity.

Genius, and Taking Pains.

Geraldine Farrar, the soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the first concert artist to be heard at the new Schubert-Curran Theatre; Miss Farrar, with a concert company consisting of a celebrated tenor and a well-known cellist being booked for a concert there Sunday afternoon, October 8th.

Few American singers have had such a career on the stage, in the concert hall, and in screen drama. For her successes there is ample reason. First of all, every one who travels or works with Miss Farrar knows that she probably spends more hours in toil at her task than any other living artist. Her endurance is phenomenal. Her persistence and the clearness of her thinking when she has a definite object in view might be formulated in text-books for young artists. No detail of her work is neglected. She spends infinite thought, not only on every phrase, every word of a text, but on her bearing on the stage or its arrangement—on everything which could possibly tend to make or mar an artistic presentation. Managers greet her with a sigh of relief, since she is the most sensible, level-headed and reliable of prima donnas; the least given to extravagance or temperamental nonsense; the most apt to do business "like a man."

The much discussed play, "Nice People," will be offered at the Columbia Theatre, following "The Rear Car." The company coming for the presentation of the piece presents a list of well-known names.

Mitzi, that charming personality of the musical-comedy stage, will be seen here next month in "Lady Billy."

"The Emperor Jones" continues to prove one of the most remarkable stage offerings of the Eastern season.

A return engagement of "Three Wise Fools" will be played at the Columbia Theatre in the near future.

Sport Degraded.

Tournament lawn tennis has been played for so many years at the Longwood Cricket Club that one would suppose there, if anywhere, the gallery would be well managed, says the New York Tribune. Its reported treatment of Mrs. Mallory in her match with Miss Helen Wills is discouraging.

Miss Wills was naturally the favorite. The brilliant girl player from San Francisco has been so close to victory over the American champion in several encounters that there was hopeful expectation of seeing her break the veteran's monotonous winning stride. It was perhaps not unfair to show preference in heartiness of applause. A gallery needn't be hypocritical. But it was grossly unfair to applaud Mrs. Mallory's errors and to show displeasure at decisions of the umpire and the linesmen when they went against Miss Wills. It is curious what rank discourtesy a crowd will exhibit, which its members as individuals would be heartily ashamed of.

The meanness of the Longwood partisans had the effect of stiffening Mrs. Mallory's determination, which is great at all times. It probably also disconcerted Miss Wills, who likes fair play or none. The result was that Mrs. Mallory won. There could have been no pleasure in the game for either contestant. Is there no way of preventing onlookers untrained in sportsmanship from spoiling good sport?

The profiteering factor aside, the proposition that the government own postoffice buildings is soundly in keeping with the general idea of applying business principles to the conduct of public business, which is by no means the least of the important things to the credit of the present administration to date, says the Washington Post. It is in line with the budget system, already adopted, with resultant saving of scores of millions of dollars to the taxpayers. At present the annual rent bill for postoffice buildings is $12,000,000. Rentals are being paid on property representing money borrowed at from 7 to 10 per cent. interest, whereas the government could build its own postoffice structures on money obtained at 4 per cent. and there would be no taxes, which, in the case of buildings now rented, are added to the price exacted by the investors. Add to the saving that would be effected under normal circumstances the saving through relief from pure extortion, and the wisdom of the government-owned buildings is beyond question.

The official flower of Butte, Montana, recently adopted, is the pansy. We suggest the coconut as the emblem of Medicine Hat.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Sophistry of Duration.

Tell me not beauty dies like dew
The envious sun draws trembling up,
Nor liken hers to that brief hue—
Flashes the rose's tender cup—
For things like her so lovely are,
They should outlive the bravest star.

If all my senses still conspire,
Ere their meridian he past,
To set the blossoms of desire,
The worm shall not exult at last:
Her children and my words I trust
Shall speak her grace when we are dust.

—Richard Aldington in the Nation and the Athenaeum.

At Star-Rise

There's something like a loud song
Singing in my heart;
And I've no shoes upon my feet,
But when shall we start?

O little dull people!
You would not know the way;
And I will talk with you again,
But not today.

Not till I am back again
From where I must be—
From the lands that are the difference
Between you and me.

For there's something like a hunger
And food will not do,
When ten million stars and more
Beckon me from you.

—A. Newberry Choyce in the New Witness.

Sun.

Sleeper in primal darkness, who first heard
God break eternal silence with a word
That stirred the chaos into form and flame;
That clove the day from night; that gave a name
In turn to every torch-enkindled star—
Elders brother, thou, to all things that are!
Beneath thy ray, revealed in light and shade,
Water took wings; the firmament was made;
And earth, arising out of ocean, bore
Fruit trees whose seed lies at the fruit's deep core.

And thou and thy sweet sister moon were given
Dominion o'er the burning lamps of heaven,
Which mark the seasons and which pull the tides
And hold the line where day from night divides.

Warmed through, the great sea-monsters spouted foam;
Fish swam the seas; the wild birds built a home;
The long procession of the beasts began;
And God in His own image created man.

Thy raging anger through the cosmos sheds
A benediction on a billion heads.
Thine is the heart at which creation stands,
Toasting before thy fire its sides and hands.

Thy universal domesticity
Comforts the purring cat, the apple tree,
The dragon fly and all things that draw life,
As equally as Adam and his wife.

When the last frozen fountain is released,
And the last harvest of the world increased
By thy beneficence; when last there dies
Sunset as an emperor upon the skies;
When, neither feeble nor with breast grown cold,
Thou perish as the prophet has foretold—
Washed over and drowned in dreadful seas of blood—

And earth is drenched with fire as with a flood:
If (as I think may be) each man may take
Some relic of the sun—for her dear sake
I'll choose that shaft of light she used to wear
On sunny days amid her mortal hair.

VANITY FAIR.

The feminist movement, to which of late we have been paying too little attention for its good, has run out on itself. We feared as much. Without proper counsel and guidance it has exceeded the wildest dreams of Carrie Chapman Catt, and even her wildest desires. It has been going so fast that it seems in danger of meeting itself coming back, unless, which is not unlikely, it shall be saved by tripping over its own feet and falling on its own powdered nose. The vocal sisterhood is strenuous in its new demands, and some of the sisters in the rear are calling in vain to those in front to warn them of the precipice over which the new impetus threatens to drag the whole dinged procession. There is a measure, ill-considered and dangerous, that is to be introduced into some forty-two legislatures, looking to "blanket equality" as the phrase has it, and there follows therefrom much fluttering of feminine nerves for fear of what feminism has most vociferously demanded, lo, these past eighty years.

Now blanket equality is a somewhat ambiguous term. In the relations between the sexes it might mean a great deal that its proponents had no intention of having it mean. But let that pass, as Babe Ruth says when he gets a bad one. It has other meanings, and it is of these that some of the leaders of feminism are afraid. They say they fear that it will not promote equality, but inequality. What they really fear is just the opposite—that it will reduce the present inequality to equality, that it will really make women legally equal to men, whereas they now have the edge on them and, as far as they understand the situation, purpose to keep it. For there has been a vast amount of remedial legislation for women, special legislation in fact, confirming unto them special privileges in industry and even in domestic affairs, which blanket equality might and probably would repeal, and then they would find themselves in the position of the little boy that wanted the bumble bee—he got it.

It may confidently be predicted that the effort to make men and women alike by law will fail. We know of no way by which it can be done. They are born different, and after that it is too late. From that critical time they differ more and more. Miss Florence Kelly, the celebrated factory inspector and leader in the feminist movement, announces the discovery that "men do not bear children, are freed from the burdens of maternity, and are not susceptible in the same measure as women to poisons now increasingly characteristic of certain industries, and to the universal poison of fatigue." Women can not be made men by act of the legislature, or by amendment of the Federal Constitution. That is an important discovery, and the wonder of it is that it should have been made by a lady who has never yet been led to the altar or the operating table. As an inspector, Miss Kelly fills the bill; she is an observant person, and in her knowledge of physiology is fit to rank with the old judge, who, to the indignant rhetorical question of the suffragette, "What is the difference between you and me?" replied, "Madam, I can't con—understand." Following on such physiological data we have had many a law of late intelligently discriminating between the sexes. Women can vote all over these fairly well United States, but in a great many of them she can not make a contract to work more than eight hours a day. Under "blanket equality," such a disability would probably be removed, and she would have the right of a man to work as she wished. Feminists want equality, but not that kind. That would be real equality. The sort they seem to want is the equality that gives women everything men enjoy, and then some. Like the Irish carpenter, they want things "more than plumb." And Carrie Chapman Catt says they should have it. A husband usually assumes the support of his wife. She bears the children, and in most cases he considers that she is to blame for that and as long as she has gone and done it she can just devote herself to the hard, dirty, and more or less thankless job of bringing them up. It is neither logical nor just, but such is the nature of the brutes, and so the custom is for him to go to his comfortable office or job and leave her to struggle with rebellion. But he knows she has her hands full, and so he attends to getting the money to pay the bills. It seems simpler for life to divide itself that way. In most states a husband must pay his wife's debts. But under blanket equality where would the liability be?

At present, woman can say to man, as the Irishman told his favorite enemy: "I'm the equal of you, an' a damn sight better." And men know it. And being usually guilty of something and feeling conscience-smitten most of the time, they are generally disposed to let bygones be bygones if the women will, and give them about what they ask. But blanket equality has them puzzled. Here for the past decade they have been giving the women inequality after inequality, privilege after privilege, and now feminine fickleness manifests itself in characteristic fashion and takes the form of a demand for whatever it is they have not. It is discouraging, and it is bewildering, and if picketing is to begin again no man may say exactly how it is to be stopped, especially as the most effective battlers are no longer battling on the same side. The National Woman's Party recently disbanded and reorganized under the same name, but with a different object. That is more confusing than foreign exchange. Just which one of these organizations is a man supposed to vote for, and how is he to know without consulting the calendar whether he was with them now or is with them before? It is a sort of stop-watch business, a question of time defined within narrow limits. Miss Elsie Hill is chairman of the National Council of the new party, and says its object is "the removal of all forms of the subjection of women." Good. But who will guarantee the removal of all forms of the subjection of men? Who will see that men are surrounded with the protection that has been thrown around women and young girls? Statutes against rape and seduction, and fixing the age of consent, are all leveled against men; not one is in their favor, not one seeks to protect their virtue against the ruthlessness of any woman. Will blanket equality redress this old iniquity? Will it raise the age of consent for men to twenty-one years, and protect their mature virtue against the wiles of the siren? Or must they still, like the sailors of Ulysses, stuff their ears with wax and bind their susceptible leaders to the mast? What masculinist will arise to protect male virtue by statute?

The blanket equality bills have been or are about to be introduced into legislatures all over the Union because of the tedious time it takes to have a constitutional amendment passed and ratified. But the National Consumers' League, which for fourteen years has been engaged in shortening the working day of wage-earning women, and the Women's Trade Union League, which has been instrumental in similar reforms, and more of them, are fearful of going to extremes, and especially are they fearful of ambiguities in the wording of the act or the ultimate amendment—for it is planned to amend the Constitution blanket-wise. The proposed amendment, which is all framed, but which no man has thus far had the hardihood to introduce, is to read: "No political, civil, or legal disabilities on account of sex or on account of marriage, unless applying alike to both sexes, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction." That's flat, but it is also fearfully broad. Miss Kelly says of it: "The implications of the amendment do not coincide with the stated purpose of the National Women's Party. While attempting to remove old forms of subjection it tends to create a new subjection of women." There seems to be no pleasing them. They have their minds made up to be both equal and unequal, subject and sovereign, and that imposes on the masculine voter the old embarrassing necessity in anything he may contemplate doing for or against, of shooting so as to hit it if it is a deer and miss it if it is a calf. But that is nothing new. In their dealing with women men have been shooting that way for ages—with the usual result of missing it when it is a deer and hitting it when it is a calf, and then paying for the calf. In passing promptly all the feminist legislation demanded of late years they have cherished the hope that they were emancipating themselves from this age-old dilemma, but it seems not to be so. There is no rest. And we shall greatly miss our guess if there is any for the opponents of blanket equality. Unless all signs fail they are in for a terrible rating at the hands of their enthusiastic sisters. No reformer's lot is a happy one these days.

Moles and Toads and Owls.

The mole is the victim of a senseless persecution, says a writer in the Contemporary Review. The gardener who finds his well-tended lawns or flower-bed in a state of mild eruption may be pardoned if he takes steps to abate the nuisance, but on the heavy-land farm the mole is entitled to every consideration. He lives upon worms and insects, the cock-chaffer bug and the wire worm being esteemed especial luxuries. The track that he throws up is really a benefit to the heavy soil, for it consists of earth that has been loosened and aerated. When the harrows have smoothed down the molehills the little mound makers have improved the texture of the land. . . .

The toad is another victim of senseless animosity. . . . Here we have the case of a very prolific animal, but it has a very high rate of mortality. The toad is not ugly and venomous, it will not live for centuries or years or even weeks "under a cold stone," it does no harm to man directly or indirectly—on the contrary it serves him well. Slugs and snails are its favorite diet; in greenhouse or conservatory it earns the gardener's thanks. There is, be it admitted, a slight penchant for bees, and the presence of a toad under the alighting board of a hive is to be deprecated, but, if the intruder be carried away to a shady garden bed and left to his own devices, he will atone for his indiscretion. Shut up in the conservatory, he will do still better. . . .

The barn owl has been known to take a score of rats a day, and it must be remembered that the rat is a night feeder, his hours being from about an hour after sunset until midnight. In the dark, a man can not see the rat that scents and avoids him; but the rat can neither see nor hear the owl, which descends upon him with silent wings and carries death in its grip, for the owl's feather-shafts are rounded and the owl's claws in gripping pierce the heart. After a time the rat grows poison-shy and trap-shy, and the spring and summer diet on preserves is endless. There are eggs and young birds, there is ample residue of the maize fed to the hens in the coops and young pheasants in the "rides." In woods over which never a hawk dares hover, in which every owl, barn, wood, long-eared, and the rest is shot on sight, where bats and weasels dare not to be seen, the rat thrives. The pace of productivity beats the game-keeper every time, and unless the farmer encourages owls—no difficult task—it will beat him, too. The rat may serve a purpose, though in the present state of our knowledge it is an unmitigated evil; in any event, its numbers and its habits constitute a national menace.

One of the oldest and most distinguished hostels in the United States is the Canoe Place Inn, between Shinnecock and Peconic Bay, on Long Island Sound. The charter of this fine, old, rambling, red-brick structure was signed by Queen Anne, but the inn was doing a thriving business years previous to this. An interesting figure is the venerable figurehead of the frigate Ohio, which, after an honorable service, was displaced by the ironclad and finally broken up in the waters which wash the cove. One of the most massive of existing figureheads, it was carved in Greece and presented, with much ceremony, to this government. It shows Hercules in impressive pose and was warranted by the Greek donors to possess magic gifts. One of the most valuable sets of registers to be found in this country is to be examined in Canoe Place Inn. Its famous autographs begin in 1659 with the mark of Wyandach, grand sachem of the Montauks, and include famous colonial governors about Manhattan, Dutch, Swedish, and English, for two hundred years. The inn fell into the hands of the British authorities during the revolutionary war and provided for the officers under Lord Howe and Sir Henry Clinton—as close an approach to a club as existed in those days in this part of the world.

Great efforts are being made in the United States to protect the native birds, mainly because of their usefulness as insect-destroyers. One expert says that in the State of Massachusetts birds destroy twenty-one thousand bushels of insects every day, and in Nebraska one hundred and seventy carloads.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Little Ellen, saying her evening prayers, was stopped several times by her mother. Finally she broke out with, "Mamma, are you running this prayer or am I?" On another occasion, being sent to bed and questioned if she had asked forgiveness, she replied: "Oh, yes, and God said, 'Oh, don't mention it, Miss Ellen. I've lots worse girls than you.'"

An American family living in China recently hired two servants from Nanking, a missionary centre. Accordingly, the new servants were Christians. Another Chinese servant in the family discovered the newcomers' religion and reported the fact to his mistress. Asked how he knew the new boys were Christians, he said: "Oh, they know all about God, Jesus Christ, and Santa Claus."

Instead of the usual boys' adventure book, Tommy's mother gave him a book of etiquette, and the results were satisfactory until one day his sister, starting to leave the room, found herself violently seized and thrown backwards into the coal scuttle. "You ignorant little beast!" growled Tommy. "Don't you know that you should wait till a gentleman opens the door for you?"

Judge's prize story of the week is as follows: A friend just returned from teaching in Kentucky tells this story of a backwoodsman who had been elected to serve in the state legislature. Arrived at the capitol, he handed his card to the doorkeeper. That individual glanced at the name, and said: "You go upstairs." "Like hell I go upstairs!" quoth the embryo maker of laws. "I was elected to the lower house, and that's where I stay!"

Actors are frequently victims of spontaneous interjections from the gallery. Sir Henry Irving was a particular sufferer in this respect. Playing Macbeth, one night, he had reached the critical point in the banquet scene when in terrible fear he sinks to his knees, covering his face with his robe, after entreating the shade of Banquo to depart. As the ghost vanished a shrill voice in the audience broke the impressive silence: "H'its all right now, 'Enery. 'E's gone!"

Lady Constance Stewart-Richardson, the dancer, who was married last year in Oriental dress and who is never very far from the limelight, is the heroine of a story in which the Duchess of Marlborough also figures. At a charity concert in one of the great English houses the host whispered to her grace, "We are to have a surprise number. Lady Constance has promised to do her barefoot Persian dance." "Oh, dear!" exclaimed the duchess. "I knew something dreadful would happen when I spilled the salt at dinner."

Rastus was always complaining about his wife. "My wife Mandy's always asking me for money," was his constant lament. One day he poured his exasperated feelings out to a sympathetic listener. "She done ask me for three dollars just now. Once she asked me for seven dollars. Last week she begged me for five. This morning she come whining for fifty cents. Always money, money, money." "Wel, what does she do with it all?" Rastus was asked. "'Deed, I don't know, sah. I nebber give her none."

The late Dr. Creighton, Bishop of London, once made a visit to Father Stanton's church in High Holborn, a most ritualistic organization. The service was not quite to his liking, but Father Stanton talked so fast that he did not have a chance to say anything until he got into his carriage to go away. Then he remarked: "I like your service, Stanton, but I don't like your incense." "Very sorry, my lord, very sorry," replied Father Stanton, submissively, "but it is the very best I can get for three shillings and sixpence a pound."

A certain small negro colony in the South, which was founded shortly after the war of emancipation, has always been singularly prosperous. However, it is rather out of the beaten path, and it aroused the curiosity of an automobile tourist, who asked a venerable citizen for some vital statistics of the place. He was told there were about sixty families. "You must have a hard time getting preachers," the tourist ventured, bearing in mind the racial love of religious exercise. "'Deed, we do, sho', suh. Thar's only 'bout twenty preachers regular."

Jokes on St. Peter are pretty stale, and, generally speaking, all of the changes have been wrung on the heavenly gates, but Hollywood seems to be an exception to all known rules. St. Peter bid a solemn welcome to three white-robed men as they approached. "Where are you from?" he asked the first. "Chicago," the man replied. "You may go in." "Where are you from?" he asked the second. "From New York," he replied.

"You may go in." "And where are you from?" he asked the third. "I'm from Hollywood," said the man. "You may go in, but I'm afraid you won't like it," said the saintly guard.

Sir Lees Knowles, a former president of the British Board of Trade and a well-known Lancashire philanthropist, tells the following story about his relative, R. G. Knowles, a famous English comedian: "I was playing at the London Theatre of Varieties, in Shore-ditch, and there was a child that would not stop crying," wrote R. G. Knowles. "It cried, and just as we all thought it was worn out it veered into a shriek, and then it howled, and to vary the monotony once in a while it yelled. The audience had lost all patience, and I had reached the limit of mine, so I said, 'Madam, dear lady, will you kindly quiet the child for the sake of the audience, for my sake, for your own sake, for the sake of the child, and for heaven's sake will you quiet the child?' She stood up, and in a piteous voice said, 'I can't; my dress buttons down the back.' We never heard the child again, for the shriek from the audience so surprised the infant that it gazed at the people open-eyed, while the mother joined in the laughter."

Decayed teeth have been found in a skull thousands of years old. Impacted wisdom teeth can be found in skulls taken from the shell mounds around San Francisco Bay and exhibited in the ethnological museum of the Affiliated Colleges. The theory that civilization causes such troubles is no sounder than the decayed molars.

When war was on, a uniform Would take Clarissa's heart by storm. It thrilled her to her girlish soul. She'd even with a bell-hop stroll, In hopes that folks would think her pal At least a Major Gen—er—al.

But now has come another day. Clarissa doesn't feel that way. In uniform, she would not pal, Not even with a Gen—er—al, For fear her friends might take him for A bell-hop from the hotel door. —Judge.

Mystery.

Where does the tall sun walk at night? Where is the frost, in June? Where, by day, do the stars take flight, Hoarding the silver moon?

Where did the roses learn to dress Green with a crimson hood? Who taught the gray dove tenderness, Hid in the fearful wood?

Where do the tired sparrows sleep When the still dusk has come? Who crowned the breakers of the deep With their eternal foam?

Where did the land's last lonely marge First take the ocean's kiss? And where did I get the nerve to charge A dollar a line for this?—C. W., in Life.

Bumper Crops in Sight.

The government's crop report in the month of August, says the Review of Reviews, is the first one of the year on which final confidence can be placed with regard to most of the farm products. The report issued on the 8th of last month was a most cheerful one. July had brought rarely favorable weather for almost all kinds of growing things on the farm. As a result, the Department of Agriculture was able to forecast a three-billion bushel corn crop for the fourth time in our history.

The greatest crop of hay ever raised, estimated at 93,100,000 tons, is already assured. The second largest yield of white potatoes and the largest production of sweet potatoes are promised, with exceptional yields of tobacco and apples. With the two wheat crops about up to the average of the last five years, the general result of the season's farming activities is as good as the best on record.

At August prices seventeen farm crops indicate a value of over $7,100,000,000, exceeding the 1921 figure by $1,200,000,000. Of this impressive total, corn accounts for $1,943,000,000, hay for $1,078,000,000, wheat for $782,000,000, and potatoes for $505,000,000.

In certain agricultural sections of the Northwest the melon-growers cover the ground with roofing paper except where the melon vine rises. This keeps down the weeds and keeps in the moisture. The method was first developed on sugar plantations in Hawaii.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Assisting the faculty in the receiving line were Miss Lena Blanding, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, Mrs. J. E. Birmingham, Mrs. Frederick Crowe, Mrs. Oscar K. Cushing, Mrs. Beverly L. Hodghead, Mrs. Parker Maddox, Mrs. M. S. Porter and Mrs. Ernest Simpson.

Tiny Mouse Deer in Captivity.

Mr. Frank H. Buck, writing in Asia Magazine, describes a little-known and fascinating species of deer, the Plandok or mouse deer of the Malay Peninsula:

"I had secured porcupines, both the common and the brush-tailed variety, Malay honey-bears, monkeys, gibbons, squirrels in variety and a half-grown leopard, but the prizes of my collection were five mouse-deer. They are exquisite miniatures of large deer. The full-grown bucks are between eleven and twelve inches high. They have light spots along the sides and a dark brown streak down the back—markings very much like those of the English fallow deer, but they have no antlers. Many legends and fairy tales have grown up around Plandok, the mouse-deer, who has won the hearts of Malay children as Brer Rabbit has our own. When I returned to Singapore I was fortunate in getting six more mouse-deer from Yew Kee, the Chinese animal dealer, who has just received them from a trader in Ipoh. I knew that every zoo in America would be glad to display these beautiful little animals; so I nursed them into captivity with unusual tenderness. But in the month before I sailed for America three of them died in spite of my care, for they are very delicate animals and most difficult to accustom to cage life. At first they beat themselves unmercifully against the sides of their cages and worried a great deal, but finally, after much coaxing and caressing, they became quite tame and even were taken out of their pen to run about the compound. Every morning one of my natives went to the marshes near Singapore to gather the water plants which are the favorite food of mouse-deer. We also gave them sweet potatoes chopped fine and a mixture of chopped apples and carrots. For the trip home I made two comfortable crates, with a separate compartment for each animal. Out of Manila one of the does had a little fawn, which was so small that it could lie flat on the palm of my hand. I spent most of my time on the ship in petting them and watching their diet as closely as if they had been babies. In every port I procured fresh water plants for them, kept their cages damp and sprinkled with clean sawdust and gave them fresh water several times a day."

Alma Mann walked from ocean to ocean in sixteen hours and twenty-six minutes, and she is only twelve years old. But she picked the easiest place: the Panama Canal Zone.

Law School Faculty Dines.

A faculty dinner was given by the San Francisco Law School at the Palace Hotel on Tuesday, August 29th. Methods of instruction were discussed and plans for enlarging the scope of study were considered.

Those in attendance were James A. Ballentine, Robert W. Harrison, Leo H. Susman, Alden Ames, Robert L. McWilliams, I. M. Peckham, Simeon E. Sheffey, Herbert W. Clark, Thomas J. Straub, Robert Beale, John Elliot Cook and Robert Johnston.

The aim of the organization since its origin has been to maintain an evening law school wherein the same standard of legal instruction given in the leading day law schools could be within reach of those industrious persons that desire legal training.

Learning One Thing Well.

The Hindus taught schoolboys only one or two subjects at a time, says V. B. Metta in the Forum, but these subjects were taught so well and so thoroughly that those who had studied them became, not mere mines of information, but really cultured beings.

The modern mind's shallowness, discursive lightness and fickleness is most probably the result of the system of teaching by snippets. In order to justify their methods, modern teachers say that the mind of the child is tired by being fixed on only one subject for a long time. But then how was it that ancient children, whether Hindu, or Chinese, or Greek, were not tired? Either they possessed better and healthier minds, or what is more probable, their interest in their subject was so thoroughly aroused that they were not tired of fixing their attention on it for a long time.

Monterey's Art Exhibit.

The Monterey Peninsula, known as the residence of many artists, is to give an exhibition of paintings at the Monterey Industrial Exhibition, now going on. Painters who visited the peninsula in the early days, and the artists now residing there, have contributed to make what experts claim will be a notable display.

Gouverneur Morris, the short-story writer, acting as chairman of arrangements, has gathered many interesting features. The chairman of the art committee is Cornelius Botke, and the chairman of the art jury is Francis McComas, who is assisted by Armin Hansen and Fred Grey. Only the best canvases have been accepted.

One feature of the exhibition is the appearance of several wives of painters, who are represented by their own canvases. Among those are Mrs. Armin Hansen, who is exhibiting under her maiden name of Frances Rives. Mrs. Francis McComas has several canvases listed as Gene Francis.

One of the prized pictures is the portrait of Robert Louis Stevenson, painted in early days by Joseph Strong when Stevenson resided in Monterey. This canvas was loaned to the Monterey Exposition by the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, together with a moonlight study by Charles Rollo Peters.

The Macmillan Company is bringing out this week a new 75-cent library of about sixty titles. The books offered in this inexpensive cloth edition include such novels as "Sandy," by S. R. Crockett; "Foe-Farrel," by Quiller-Couch, and "The Three Brothers," by Eden Phillpotts, as well as many outdoor books—Kane's "Adrift in the Ice Pack," Ruxton's "Wild Life in the Rocky Mountains," and Kephart's "Camping and Woodcraft"—more than twenty favorite juvenile books, and such classics as the "Golden Treasury," Robinson's "Three Taverns," and Mabie's collection of Old English ballads.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"He's an excellent driver." "Auto, golf, or charity fund?"—Detroit Free Press.

Scamp—There's too much rouge on your lips. Pamp—Oh, well, the evening's young yet.—Princeton Tiger.

Bolshevik—What a perfectly ideal country America would be under Soviet rule. "Yes, Serge, but who would feed us then?"—Life.

"You look dejected." "Yes, married life gets on my nerves." "Been married long?" "No, the marriage takes place tomorrow."—Judge.

Bellhop (after guest has rung for ten minutes)—Did you ring, sir? Guest—Hell, no! I was tolling; I thought you were dead.—Wesleyan Wasp.

Indignant Day-Tripper (to sleeping wife)—"Ere, Alice, wake up and enjoy yourself. I aint spent seven-and-a-tanner to bring you 'ere to go to sleep!"—London Opinion.

"The leading man isn't as good in this scene as he was in the love scene you shot yesterday." "Oh, he's learned since then that the star is the director's wife."—Life.

Caller—I suppose, Tommy, you love your new little sister very dearly. Tommy (eying the baby coldly)—Yes, but I'd a good deal rather have a dog.—Boston Transcript.

"Fechtin' again, ye wicked lad?" "Aye, an' I'll be at him again if he keeps on saying I wear a kilt because my feet are over big to get into trousers."—London Passing Show.

Mistress (annoyed)—How do you manage to make so much noise in the kitchen, Norah? Cook—Well, you just try to break four plates without making a noise.—Boston Transcript.

Clerk (trying for a raise)—I can't live on my salary, sir. Employer—I'm sorry to hear that. I was about to promote you to the head of our economy department.—Boston Transcript.

First Lady—I suppose you're off to the seaside soon? Second Lady (of the new aristocracy)—Oh, we've quite given up the seaside. We only go to watering-places now.—Punch.

Old Dame—When I was your age, a young man would never let a lady stand in a tram car. Young Man—No. At that time, ma'am, people traveled in stage coaches.—Stockholm Kasper.

Mose—Whut you doin' fr a livin' now, big boy? Hose—I is the janitor on a boat. Mose—Gwan away—boats ain't got'n no janitors. Hose—Is, too—this is a flat boat.—Stanford Chapparral.

Efficiency Expert—This system will aid your clerks in getting their work done quickly. Business Man—But what I want is a system that will aid them in getting their loafing done quickly.—Judge.

Visitor (at very quiet seaside place)—And whatever do you people do with yourselves in the winter? Landlady—Oh, we talks and laughs about the people what stays 'ere in the summer.—Punch.

Married Man (to friend)—You bachelors don't feel comfortable either at home or when you're away. Get married and you'll at least feel comfortable when you're away.—Stockholm Sondags-Nisse.

Hub—Your bills are awfully heavy again this month, my dear. Wife—Well, of all the nerve! You know father still pays all my bills. Hub—That's just it. How can I have the cheek to ask him to meet any of mine when you're touching him up all the time?"—Boston Transcript.

Maiden (to steward)—Oh, there's my fiancé on the pier! I wonder if I could go down and say good-by to him? Steward—I am afraid not, madam. The boat leaves in two hours.—California Pelican.

"What, Gladys! You want to leave to be married? Why, this is most unexpected." "But, ma'am, it isn't my fault. Your son didn't ask me to marry until last night."—London Weekly Telegraph.

"The dwelling was to be in the latest and modern style, and as soon as we enter it the plaster falls, the windows are broken—" "Yes, madam, it is the latest modern style."—Munich Megendorfer Blätter.

"Do you approve of a government censorship for the theatre?" "No," replied Miss Cayenne. "Politics in business hasn't been enough of a success to encourage the idea of politics in art."—Washington Star.

"You know, Reggie, dad simply can't see you. He insists you're a born fool." "But, of course, you stick up for me?" "Yes, indeed. I always tell him your success is entirely due to your own efforts."—Judge.

"Did you notice that girl who just passed?" "The one with the bright blue sweater, silk stockings with roses about three inches apart, sport shoes, bobbed hair and—" "Yes." "Not particularly."—Grinnell Malteaser.

Mistress—I really must get another kitchen-maid, cook. Jane is so careless and behaving so badly. Do you think Mrs. Smith's registry office is a good one? Cook—Oh, not so bad, ma'am. That's where I got you.—Punch.

Prison Visitor (sympathetically)—Now, my good man, what brought you here? Convict—Mistaken confidence? Prison Visitor—Really—in whom were you deceived? Convict—Myself—I thought I could run faster.—London Weekly Telegraph.

Lawyer—I think I can get you a divorce, madam, for cruel and inhuman treatment. But do you think your husband will fight the suit? Woman—Fight! Why, man, the little shrimp can't even come into a room where I am!—Chicago Herald.

"How is the liquor supply around here?" inquired an arid tourist in the Ozarks. "Out!" succinctly replied Gabe Gosnell of Fiddle Creek. "Since the infernal revenuers took to raiding round yur most folks is so dry that when they mail a letter they have to pin the stamp on."—Kansas City Star.

"How do you expect to draw business to your summer hotel if you don't advertise radio concerts?" "Softly," replied the astute manager. "I passed the word around among my prospective patrons that the nearest thing to a radio about my place was an echo, and there isn't a vacant room in the house."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Bill—Wot d'yer think about this 'ere Frenchman, Bert, an' his auto-suggestion cure? Bert—D'yer mean that bloke wot says you've only got to keep on repeating "Every day I get better and better," an' you do get better if ye're poorly? Bill—Yes, that's the bloke, Bert. Bert—I believe in 'im, Bill. Why, every day for the last three months I've bin sayin' to myself, "Some day I'll get a summons for not paying my rate," an' strike me pink, yesterday it landed.—Pearson's Weekly.

In the days when English gilded youths had money and cab fares were inconsequential it used to be great fun about 11 o'clock at night to get in a "night hawk" at Charing Cross and tell the driver to go to Trafalgar Square, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger. Then when the jehu had covered the block that separates the two inform him that he was wrong and had not taken his fare to the right Trafalgar Square, but should have gone to one of three others miles away. This pastime was recalled this month when the London County Council, a body which has general jurisdiction over the independent boroughs that compose London, had before it a suggestion that some of the conflicting street names be eliminated. But the four Trafalgar Squares are by no means the only conflict, and in many cases the same name is carried by seven or eight streets in as many parts of the city. The confusion grew out of the fact that the authorities of the boroughs had no idea when they named their streets that some day each of them would be swallowed up in the immense city that is now London. The puzzle to an American is how a cab-driver or taxi-man nowadays ever gets them all straight, and as a usual thing he knows how to get home as well if not better than you do.

The Italians number the hours of the day up to twenty-four. The Persians have a different name for every day in the month. But when ferry commutation coupons are numbered by the day of the year it is only a nuisance to the commuter.

Where Sirens Still Sing

The women of Tabiti, lovely and easily loving, have long been famed as the sirens of sailors, writes Edward A. Salisbury in Asia Magazine. I found them in no way changed. I landed at Papeete with my crew intact. When I sailed away, six weeks later, I was short two mates, an engineer and a third of my sailors. Some of them were ill, but most had succumbed to the lure of the island. As I write now, I catch a glimpse of laughing girls, barefooted, dressed in gay pareus, with bright flowers in their hair, going down a Papeete street, hand in hand with my two bull-necked Swedish mates, Chris and John. They were both honest sailors, but that was the last I saw of them. The "Coconut Girls" of Papeete figured in my moving pictures. It is true that all Tahitians innately love a lover, which is by no means to say, however, that social lines are not drawn sharply in Papeete society. These "Coconut Girls" are a class of their own. They have come to Tahiti from many neighboring islands, brought by fair promises or the lure of the "city," and left by the men they came with. They live up among the coconut groves behind the town and are a happy, care-free lot, quite content with the gift of a seat at the "movies," if from one they like. When the fancy strikes them or they want a new pareu, they may wait on table at the hotels. My film-taking was a great lark for them. They pictured splendidly on the film, but my difficulty was to keep them in one place long enough to finish a reel. San Francisco brewers who established breweries in Tahiti when prohibition came into force in the United States made my work no easier. I would take down to the beach two automobiles filled with girls, laughing and shouting at every pedestrian, but when the cameras were set up and I was ready to begin work, too often half the girls and most of my assistants had disappeared. So when I sailed from Papeete, I left steamer tickets for the missing members of the crew. When I arrived in America over a year later, a friend showed me a newspaper headline something like this: "Returned Crew Says Salisbury Reincarnated Wolf Larsen." Wolf Larsen would have murdered more than one man if he had a crew ashore at Tahiti.

OLD AMERICAN STOCK DYING.

New England, once the prolific nursery of the ambitious, intelligent "Yankee stock," which trekked forth in millions to settle the West, is fast ceasing to be Anglo-Saxon country, writes Lothrop Stoddard in "The Revolt Against Civilization" (Charles Scribner's Sons). In Massachusetts the birth rate of foreign-born women is two and one-half times as high as the birth rate among the native-born; in New Hampshire two times; in Rhode Island one and one-half times.

Outside of the South and parts of the West the old native American stock is not reproducing itself, the birth rates of immigrant stocks from northern and western Europe are rapidly falling, while the birth rates among the immigrant stocks from southern and eastern Europe remain high and show comparatively slight diminution. The American intellectual groups are much less fertile than similar European groups. The average number of children per married graduate of the leading

American colleges like Harvard and Yale is about two, while among the leading women's colleges it is about one and one-half. Furthermore, the marriage rates of college men and women are so low that, considering married and single graduates together, the statistical average is about one and one-half children per college man and something less than three-fourths of a child per college woman. Professor Cattell has investigated the size of families of 440 American men of science, choosing only those cases in which the ages of the parents indicated that the family was completed. Despite a very low death rate, the birth rate was so much lower than, as he himself remarks, "it is obvious that the families are not self-perpetuating. The scientific men under fifty, of whom there are 261 with completed families, have on the average 1.88 children, about 12 per cent. of whom die before the age of marriage. What proportion will marry we do not know; but only about 75 per cent. of Harvard and Yale graduates marry; only 50 per cent. of the graduates of colleges for women marry. A scientific man has on the average about seven-tenths of an adult son. If three-fourths of his sons and grandsons marry, and their families continue to be of the same size, 1000 scientific men will leave about 350 grandsons to marry and transmit their names and their hereditary traits. The extermination will be still more rapid in female lines."

A brother-author, on meeting M. Pierre Loti for the first time, asked him if he had read a certain book of Bourget's. "No," he replied, "but then, you see, I never read. I have never read anything, not even Chateaubriand, though he has been called my master." "But," exclaimed the other man, "surely you've read Montaigne, Molière, La Fontaine?" "Not one of them. Only a good deal of the Bible as a boy, and since I grew up a few of my friends' books."

The "touch system" of manipulating a typewriter is said to have put American typists ahead of those of Great Britain. Yet the poor old British Empire manages to struggle along.

The Bonus Bill—and a Precedent.

The bonus bill, having passed both the House and the Senate, is now in the hands of a conference committee and in the way of speedily being put up to President Harding. Various efforts have been made to get from Mr. Harding some intimation of his purpose respecting it. But he has made no response. His statement some two or three months ago to the effect that he could not approve any measure failing to provide means for meeting its costs to the treasury still stands; and under it there is hope that he may kill the bill by veto.

This is not the first bonus bill. In 1874 there was introduced into the Forty-Third Congress a bonus bill camouflaged like the present one by a seductive title. It proposed a donation from the treasury to each man who saw service in the civil war of $8.33 for each month of military service. It further provided a land-warrant option. It was estimated that the cost of the measure to the taxpayers of the country would run from approximately $20,000,000 up to $150,000,000 and that it would draw upon the public lands of the country to the extent of 400,000,000 acres. This bill passed the House by a vote of 177 to 40 and later passed the Senate by a bare majority of one vote—31 to 30 votes—the presiding officer casting the deciding vote. The bill went to President Grant, who returned it with this message:

House Bill No. 3341 is herewith returned without my approval, for the reasons, first, that it appropriates from the treasury a large sum of money at a time when the revenue is insufficient for current wants and this proposed further drain upon the treasury.

The issue of bonds, authorized by the bill to a very large and indefinite amount, would seriously embarrass the refunding operations now progressing, whereby the interest of the bonded debt of the United States is being largely reduced.

Second, I do not believe that any considerable portion of the ex-soldiers who, it is supposed, will be the beneficiaries of this appropriation are applicants for it, but, rather, it would result more in a measure for the relief of claim agents and middlemen who would intervene to collect or discount the bounties granted by it.

The passage of this bill at this time is inconsistent with the measures of economy now demanded by the necessities of the country.

U. S. GRANT.

Here is a precedent that Mr. Harding will do well to follow.

The Tomb of Lincoln.

Many years ago the little town of Salem, Illinois, a few miles north of Springfield, identified with the early manhood of Abraham Lincoln, passed out of existence. There remain now only a few tumble-down wrecks of wooden buildings to mark a spot that must forever be historic. Representative Shaw of Illinois has presented to Congress a project providing for Federal purchase, improvement, and up-keep of Salem. His idea is to restore the town as it was—the tavern, the village store, the log houses. The whole, according to his plan, should duplicate the conditions of Lincoln's time and so become a species of museum illustrating an early but now gone-by phase of Western American life. The project seems a bit whimsical, yet something may be said for it.

Lincoln's body as all the world knows was taken back to his former home at Springfield, where it is entombed in a "memorial structure" which, regarded from the standpoint of art, is probably the very worst specimen in the whole world, even more tawdry, and uglier, than the Albert Memorial in London, which is saying a good deal. There has just been created at Washington a Lincoln Memorial building. It is placed charmingly adjacent to Potomac Park. Designed upon classical lines and done exquisitely in every detail, it is perhaps the most beautiful structure in the world, certainly beyond any other this side of the Atlantic. Here at the nation's capital and in the noble building raised in his memory would be the proper sepulchre for Abraham Lincoln. Here, available to multitudes, it would become an inspiration of high moral and patriotic value. At Springfield it is so far removed from the main currents of American life as practically to be lost to the public consciousness. Perhaps the one person living and having authority to dispose of the body of Abraham Lincoln is his son Robert. In his turn Robert Lincoln has creditably served his country. He has now opportunity of further service in so disposing of the dust that was once his father as to bring it concretely and for all time to the consciousness of oncoming generations of Americans.

It may be argued that it matters little what disposition may be made of the physical remains of the dead. True enough of mankind in general. But there abides in the relics of a great personality that which unfailingly affects the sensibilities of the living. Who can appraise the stimulus to French patriotism of the famous sarcophagus in the Invalides that contains the dust of Napoleon Bonaparte? How significant a fact in American life has been and continues to be the tomb of Washington! Mount Vernon is a Mecca to which thousands repair year after year. The tomb of General Grant in the metropolis draws its thousands of visitors day by day. And it is not too much to say that no man can look upon either of these memorials without revivification of the spiritual element in his nature. The body of Abraham Lincoln, in a noble shrine, and so placed as to be available to multitudes, would be an asset of incalculable moral value.

"Reasonable Comfort."

Among the issues accentuated by the railroad strike is that between the practice of paying labor according to what it earns, and the socialistic proposal to pay it according to "what it needs." The demand has been made on the Railroad Labor Board that the principle be recognized of fixing minimum rates of pay which will insure the subsistence of the worker and his family in health and "reasonable comfort." This would revolutionize the basis of compensation, and the Labor Board refuses to do it.

To pay men what they "need," for "reasonable comfort," would be an ideal procedure, but it could be instituted only in a society of ideal men. The doctrine is one to which we should like to subscribe, if it could be given effect, but as generally stated it is vague, uncertain in meaning, and open to misinterpretation and abuse. There is no unit of measurement, no standard of comparison, by which "reasonable comfort" can be defined. Belief in it comes from socialism's failure to understand the fundamental economic fact that values are subjective.

The proposal was enunciated in 1918 by Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the National War Labor Board, as part of "the presidential policy for labor," and so it is to be identified as a child of the Wilson administration; to which, in fact, it bears so strong a resemblance that its paternity could never be denied. It belongs with those other hypnotic Wilsonian phrases, "watchful waiting," "too proud to fight," "peace without victory," and the like. The evil effects of the White House dalliance with Gompers, the surrenders involved in such measures as the Adamson Act, are things from which we shall long suffer. And one of the particular curses bequeathed us, to crop up in the present crisis and add to the current perversions of opinion, is this unmodified official phrase of "reasonable comfort," without any method of describing it, of saying what is comfort and what is reasonable—apparently leaving it to be checked only by that other Wilsonian concept, "self-determination."

At that, it is a seductive doctrine, seductively phrased, especially appealing to benevolent sentiment. It does seem that society has somehow failed unless it can guarantee "the subsistence of the worker and his family in health and reasonable comfort." Without close scrutiny that appears to be a mild demand, and one we should all like to see fulfilled. But it is merely a beautiful dream, and, without a score of working checks not yet invented and some others impossible of application, it could not be brought into general accordance with the facts of life. Economic and biological potencies are involved of which it takes no account. And like the rest of socialism it won't work, much as we might like to see it.

Paying its labor enough to insure self-determined "reasonable comfort" would be a policy no nation could stand, one no society is rich enough to support. The basis would be unstable. "Reasonable comfort" can not be specified. It is a subjective thing. The concept of it varies with the individual. Any average notion of it would change from day to day, and the only thing certain about the changes would be that every one would lay a heavier load on the community. Pay the average man, worker or other, upon the basis of what he thinks he needs today, and tomorrow he will need twice as much. His necessities will increase while he sleeps. If he has a wife and five children now, in five years he

Have a wife and ten children. And they will have two automobiles, and the wife will have added to her culture by cultivating a taste for Siberian mink.

In fact, if we examine this unmodified doctrine we shall find that our feet are entangled in more Wilsonian phrases. "The subsistence of the worker and his family." How large a family? That is something every housewife must know when she does her marketing, and surely the nation ought to know it if it is to provide for the families of all the workmen in the country. "In health and reasonable comfort." Just what is meant by "reasonable comfort"? Let us get down to the brass tacks of it. Is it to be found for the workman and his family in the motion-picture show, comparatively inexpensive; or in a ten-room house for the growing brood, embellished with art and supplied with luxuries? Who shall say where comfort stops and luxury begins, or where necessity leaves off and comfort begins? How many would be satisfied with any other person's opinion on the subject? Or even with the interpretation of some board of socialist politicians? Or even with their own appraisal of last year?

The idealists that "believe in" such arrangements, both as to their possibility and desirability, talk a great deal about the lack of "social justice" in the existing order. But where would be the basis of justice in paying workmen enough to insure the subsistence of them and their families in self-determined "reasonable comfort"? Of two workmen of equal value to the community one may have a wife and two children and the other a wife and ten. Under the policy of paying them what they might think they need for "reasonable comfort," or what some state socialist commission might decide they needed, we should have to take a large part of the reward from the man with the wife and two and give it to the man with the wife and ten; or else throttle down the energies of the former to balance his earnings and receipts.

Unless there is to be a limit on the family which society is to support "in health and reasonable comfort," there will be no limit on the population. Very few persons in our hundred million are guided by spiritual considerations in courses unselfish and beneficial to the community. Mankind in the mass is little above the animal yet, though it is sheltered by sawed lumber and window-glass and has access to sanitary plumbing. The Malthusian principle is eternally scientific: that "population tends to press upward upon the limit of subsistence." Generally speaking, that is true of men as well as rats. That is biology. That is social dynamics. That is life; not, perhaps, life "as it ought to be," but life as it is. The vast majority of men are mainly concerned with their natural instincts. To eat, to sleep, to talk the hours away, to glut the procreative appetite, are their chief desires. If there is in the mass of them any real longing for the culture Mr. Gompers has lately taken the agency for, it only manifests itself individually, to raise the individual out of the mass. Millions are impelled by religious teachings to overpopulate their households, their class, and their country. If the ceaseless commands of nature and faith were reinforced by the assurance of self-determined "reasonable comfort," if whenever a child was born the father's wages were raised, the fecundity of the rabbits in Australia would be left in the dust by that of human beings in the United States. Industry could not keep up with it, and the doctrine itself would soon be defeated by the ruin it had caused.

These are hard things to say, but they should be said. It may be conceded that men have a right to live, but so has the community. Providing the workman with what he might decide to need for comfortable subsistence is not the business of society, it is the business of the workman. He can not safely be relieved of the fear of poverty, any more than the rest of us can. If he were, production would cease, reproduction would be tropically stimulated, and the fact instead of the fear of poverty would come upon us all. What the workman is entitled to is not the Wilson guarantee of an undefined "reasonable comfort," but the Harding guarantee of the "right of free men willing to work to work in security." The workman is entitled to what he can earn under normal conditions, and he must make it go as far as he can. He must cut his coat according to his cloth. It is all that most of us can do, it is the best society has been able to devise, and workmen are not entitled to any special privileges. They are not entitled, for example, to eat up in excessive wages the substance of any other equally productive class, and destroy it—a process that is beginning, that is the avowed purpose of many radicals, and that will reach just that objective unless the aggressions of organized labor are halted at the limits of the law by courageous courts and executives. But if the courts and executives, and Congress itself, are to act courageously, there must be no confusion of public opinion about what society can and can not do in the matter.

The issue is one that will have to be faced by the country, and this discussion is rendered timely by the fact that after many classes of labor had attained far more than the living wage of college instructors Mr. Gompers, at the Denver meeting of the American Federation of Labor, left even that goal behind and began his agitation for "cultural opportunities" for the laborer. And that has been consistently followed by the demand of the president of the union of maintenance of way employees that the Labor Board recognize the principle of "subsistence in reasonable comfort," and his intimation that the matter would be brought before Congress. And Congress as a whole has become a timid and pliable body, which, having little will of its own, needs to be stiffened up by that of an intelligent public.

The Supreme Court.

Substitution of former Senator Sutherland for Associate Justice Clarke tends notably to strengthen the Supreme Court. And, we say it without prejudice, the court needs strengthening. Of its nine members, three—Day, Holmes, and McKenna—are past the retiring age. Of these, Justice Day (age seventy-three) has recently been named umpire of the mixed American-German Claims Commission, which should imply retirement from the bench. Holmes (age eighty-one) and McKenna (aged seventy-nine) can not in the nature of things much longer remain in active service.

That Day, Holmes, and McKenna, in spite of weight of years, have continued on the bench is generally attributed to their concern for the character of the court. It is an open secret that they were alarmed for its future in consideration of the character of men President Wilson appointed. McReynolds is a sound man and a sound judge, but both Brandeis and Clarke are radicals of rather extreme type. While the former is a man of fine legal mind and capable of response to the sobering responsibilities of judicial authority, the latter is little more than a compound of socialistic prejudices. He retires by resignation at the relatively early age of sixty-five, and the common understanding is that he does so because he has found himself out of tune with the spirit of the court. For one thing, he and McReynolds are openly unfriendly to each other and he is in many things at odds with the other members of the court. By nature something of an agitator and fond of spectacular appearances, Clarke has been unhappy under the restraints imposed upon him by judicial office. More than once he has shocked his colleagues by indiscretions. He will breathe easier in unofficial life and the court will be more comfortable without him.

The Supreme Court now consists of seven Republicans, including Sutherland, and two Democrats. President Wilson appointed none but Democrats on the Supreme Bench and to other courts of the Federal judicial system. President Harding replaces Clarke by a Republican, but he recently appointed a Democrat to a Federal judgeship in Georgia. It is expected that with the retirement of McKenna, Holmes, and Day, President Harding will appoint at least one Democrat, and in the common opinion Senator Shields of Tennessee is already slated. Another Democratic possibility is John W. Davis of West Virginia and New York. It is suggested that the appointment of Davis would not only bring to the Supreme Bench a man notably capable, but that it would remove from the political field a possible rival for the presidency. This suggestion is a bit gratuitous, in consideration of Mr. Harding's apparent indifference to a second term, and it is only worth noting as an item of current gossip.

Since the days of McKinley the entire personnel of the Supreme Court has changed; and since its foundation in 1789 only seventy-one men have been appointed to that bench. There have been nine chief justices. It fell to President Wilson to name one-third of the membership of the court. Already, though he has been in office only a year and a half, President Harding has named a chief justice and an associate justice, and he will almost certainly have the appointment of three more associate justices.

The present senior member of the Supreme Bench is McKenna of California, now in the twenty-fifth year of his service. Up to this time only two men from the Pacific Coast have sat on the Supreme Bench—the late Associate Justice Field and Associate Justice McKenna. George H. Williams of Oregon was nominated chief justice by President Grant in the '70s, but withdrew prior to action by the Senate. Beyond a doubt another Pacific Coast man will be named in McKenna's place when he retires.

Editorial Notes.

There is little satisfaction in current primary election returns for those who have been prophesying rout of the Republican party this fall. In almost every instance incumbents have been renominated, and by normal majorities. The results in Tuesday's primaries are of special note as they relate to Senator Lodge of Massachusetts and Senator Townsend of Michigan. Lodge's majority is larger than at any time since the direct primary came into vogue. Townsend's success plainly indicates that the Michiganders are not in sympathy with the effort to prejudice Mr. Townsend on the score of his sympathy with Senator Newberry. Summarization of primary elections thus far held the country over indicate a general and normal state of the political atmosphere. There is no sign of popular favor for Wilsonism. The outlook is for continued control of both houses of Congress by the Republicans, though it will not be surprising if the existing heavy majority in the House shall be cut down. Indeed it will be far better so. Where the margin is large the inevitable effect is to destroy the sense of party obligation. On the other hand, a narrow margin tends to promote a spirit of loyalty to party and to sustain the discipline essential to unity of action and the carrying out of party pledges.

The convention at Portland has made a forward step in striking the word "obey" from the pledge exacted at the altar from the bride. But the concession comes late. Not within any living memory has the pledge to obey had practical validity. No bride this half-century past has murmured the word "obey" without the mental reservation typified in crossed fingers. Many have resorted to delicate subterfuge by substituting a rhythmic "be gay." There was further proposal at Portland to eliminate from the marriage service pledge on the part of the groom to "endow" the bride with all his worldly goods. Here again practice has outrun fact. In so many instances endowment is the other way round that the pledge becomes both an anachronism and a joke. But in the wisdom of the assembled churchmen the pledge, though practically meaningless, is still to be exacted.

Despite frantic "gestures" on the part of brotherhood leaders it becomes evident that the railroad strike is petering out. The men in the service of many of the roads are forming independent unions and are returning to their jobs. Here in California conditions brought about by the strike are wholly dissipated. All trains are running, and in the Southern Pacific machine shops more men are now in service than when the strike began. This is measurably the situation elsewhere. Practically all is now over except the shouting which is maintained in the face of obvious defeat by the few leaders who are striving less to rally their one-time followers than to maintain their own places—with the salaries and allowances thereunto pertaining.

It is not easy at this distance to follow the swiftly-moving drama of Greek politics. One obvious fact is that the royalist régime has failed both militarily and civilly and that the best hope for the country lies in restoration of the authority of ex-Premier Venizelos. Whether or not Greece is ready for democratic institutions comparable to our own we will not even venture a guess. But we suspect that the Greeks need a ruler as distinct from a president. Most peoples that have not had extended schooling in at least the minor responsibilities of government are better served by a strong hand than by "self-determination." Venizelos is unquestionably a capable administrator and a practical if not a sentimental patriot. At the head of the Greek people he will be something between a king and a president. That is probably the system best adapted to the present status of the Greeks.

It is hardly surprising that scandal after scandal should develop in connection with prohibition enforcement. Men who will accept this service are likely to be either necessitous, and therefore subject to temptation, or of low character, and therefore eager to be tempted. Thus, a service that should be sustained, if at all, by character is placed in unfit and even in vicious hands. The devices practiced in enforcement of the law are in a moral sense quite as mischievous and more contemptible than the crimes they seek to uncover. Can anything too severe be said of maintenance by the prohibition enforcement authorities of a "blind pig" as a trap for the unwary? It may be added that a law which requires for its enforcement the practice of calculated fraud can not and ought not to command the respect of decent people.

Mr. Beveridge, who is expected to return to the Senate next year, has taken up the cudgels against Senator La Follette in the latter's attack upon the Supreme Court of the United States. La Follette, it will be remembered, has proposed an amendment to the Constitution giving to Congress authority to nullify any decree of the Supreme Court. To this Beveridge makes answer:

If Congress alone is to interpret the Constitution for itself, then necessarily there would be as many different meanings given to the Constitution as there would be changing congressional majorities of different opinions. In the nature of things, congressional interpretation of the Constitution is kaleidoscopic interpretation.

Since the war, and until just now, German and Austrian artists have been excluded from the French exhibitions. But a change has come over the temper of the French art world. A canvass recently taken of fifty leading artists resulted in a vote of forty-nine to one favoring readmittance of the German artists to the French exhibitions. German operas, which during the war and for a considerable period after were not tolerated in Paris, are now admitted to popular favor.

By negative action the convention of bishops of the Episcopal church in session at Portland has rejected a proposal to abrogate the rule under which clergymen of that denomination may not, excepting under especial circumstances, perform the marriage ceremony where one of the parties applying has been divorced. The issue arose upon the initiative of the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant of New York, a clergyman of the sensational type, who wishes himself to marry a well-known lady of the New York fashionable world who has been twice divorced. Concurrently, the bishops of the Anglican Church of the West Indies, who have just held their provincial synod, have resolved as follows:

We reaffirm the indissolubility of marriage and refuse to admit any relaxation of the principle contained in the table of kindred and affinity for church people, even where civil law sanctions such relaxation.

It is, of course, possible to admire consistency based upon principle. But as a matter of policy the Episcopal church does itself no good by these refusals. The modern world quite definitely and positively sanctions divorce; and if Episcopal clergymen may not marry divorced persons there are plenty of other means of getting the matrimonial knot tied. Here in San Francisco Judge Graham will do the trick as neatly as any cleric. We have yet to hear of an instance where a man and a woman wishing to marry have been deterred from so doing by refusal of some Episcopal clergyman to officiate. The case of the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant is exceptional in that he is himself a clergyman. If he marries a divorced woman he will be disciplined by his bishop—in other words, he will have to give up his job.

A recent incident less than a thousand miles from San Francisco may serve to suggest a way out of their troubles for the Rev. Grant and his lady love. The Rev. Rastus Johnsing, pastor of an "Afro-American" flock, applied to a local banker for a donation. "It seems to me," replied the victim of this gentle touch, "that our very considerable colored population ought to be able to support its own church." "What I had mos' in mind, sir," replied the soft-voiced Johnsing, "was a contribution, sir for my pers'nal suppo't and comfo't. Our people, sir, they don't be as lib'ral as they ought, sir, and I thought, sir, that you might be willin' out of the gen'rous 'dowment that our good Lord has bestowed upon you, sir, to do a little something for my pers'nal behalf." "Why," replied the banker, "we have here something like seven thousand colored people. Surely you must get in wedding fees a pretty generous support?" "I sadly say it, sir," replied the Rev. Johnsing, "that you are mistak'n, sir. You see, sir, a'many of our people, sir, jist takes up."

Hon. John Sharp Williams is retiring from the Senate, not because the people of Mississippi wish him to quit, but because after a congressional service of twenty-seven years he needs to do something in the way of rebuilding his personal fortunes. Senator Williams is not without certain amiable weaknesses. But he is a man for a' that—a man of intellect, a man of courage, a man of integrity. We excerpt from his remarks in the Senate on the bonus bill these noble sentences:

I did not rise to argue this question. I arose in order to present my protest against the assertion that my two boys and my nephews and the other boys who served in the army of their country sacrificed two or three years of their lives.

I merely rose to say that they did not sacrifice them; they glorified them; they sanctified them in the eyes of God, of men, and of good women.

Who would measure in dollars the dear love of a man for his native land? When a boy with warm blood in his veins answers the call of his country and goes out to fight for civilization against military autocracy, I scorn the suggestion that he wasted the number of days, months, or years devoted to that purpose.

I only pray that there may be an opportunity for you when you die to die in some cause so worthy that it may glorify your death and sanctify it just as these boys' lives were glorified and sanctified by their services, and just as in death their comrades, left behind them on Flanders fields, were glorified and sanctified.

Mr. Gompers complains for his unions: "We have life, we take what liberty is doled out to us, but we are still in pursuit of happiness." That is just about the way it is with the rest of us, and it does not make the pursuit any easier to have the transportation tied up and the coal supply threatened every little while. One trouble with Mr. Gompers is that he fails to understand that there are a great many more of us in this country than his four-million-odd members of labor unions.

Now we have an explanation, from the manager of the Valley Creamery Company, of the discrepancy in milk prices on the two sides of the Bay. It appears from this gentleman's statement that 13-cent milk in San Francisco causes an unsaleable surplus which is taken to Oakland and sold for 10 cents. In other words, they tilt up the milk can on this side of the Bay and pour out the milk on the other. We hope some of the Oakland dealers will become infuriated to the point of retaliation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Lloyd George Revised.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Sir: In your issue of July 29th last you reproduced a communication of mine which you headlined "Correcting Lloyd George." From the following may we conclude that he has corrected himself? In a speech delivered not long ago in the city of Aberystwyth, Wales, Lloyd George said, amongst other things: "I am aware that many people doubt the wisdom of Great Britain for having participated in the war. On my part I do not regret the decision, for if we had kept ourselves aloof we would have had an arrogant, unmerciful military empire dominating the whole of Europe, holding under her yoke France and Russia and violating, under an iron-clad tyranny, all national liberties. Great Britain would then have had to face this arrogant empire and I, for one, dare not contemplate what would have happened at the final collision." This corroborates the words expressed in my last: "Had the Germans succeeded in taking Calais, Dunkerque, and the French North Sea coast, the history of the war would have resulted very differently for every one of the Allies." I wonder whether Lloyd George reads the Argonaut.

Yours truly,
Joris Van Antwerpen.

Japan is the one important country of the world with which the 1922 trade of this country shows an increase. Imports from the whole world in the fiscal year 1922, says a survey by the National City Bank, shows a fall of 28 per cent. in value, while from Japan alone imports show an increase of 18 per cent. The 1922 exports to the whole world show a reduction of 42 per cent. in value, while those to Japan show an increase of 30 per cent. The imports from Japan in the fiscal year 1922 approximate $300,000,000, against $253,000,000 in the fiscal year 1921, and the exports to that country in 1922 were about $245,000,000, against $189,000,000 in the preceding year. This estimate of the 1922 trade with Japan is based upon official figures of the eleven months, while those of the trade with the whole world in the full fiscal year are official.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

IMMIGRANT SELECTION.

(Washington Post.)

The most serious gravamen of the charge brought by Secretary of Labor Davis against the 3 per cent. immigration restrictive law enacted last year and now in operation is that by the passport systems in effect throughout the world power is lodged in the hands of foreign governments to say who shall and who shall not emigrate to the United States. It is obvious that all those nations which are not overburdened with an excessive population—and since the war not many are in that category—will do their best to keep at home the most desirable classes and individuals among their own citizens, while they will facilitate the departure of those whose absence is a good riddance and who, as the phrase goes, leave their country for their country's good. It is easy to see that the working of such a system, spread over a series of years, would eventually make the United States a dumping ground for the wastrels, the incompetent, and the mauvais sujets of all Europe.

The Secretary not unnaturally complains that the immigration stock which has played so important a part in the up-building of America is not forthcoming under the present programme. That such is the fact is not open to doubt, as the statistics on alien immigrants analyzed a few days ago in the Post abundantly prove. Many causes doubtless contribute to this regrettable result, but foremost among them is the check on movements of population afforded by the passport and visé scheme.

Mr. Davis is of opinion that before the present temporary law expires a radically different method of dealing with the immigration problem will have to be evolved. Among other things, he suggests that American officials at ports of embarkation should be empowered to subject intending immigrants to examinations involving mental, physical, and other characteristics. In that way, he thinks, it could be insured that this country would get immigrants of a constructive type. At all events, the whole question is one that must soon engage the attention of Congress once more. When that occurs, those advance recommendations of one who has given much earnest thought and study to the many-sided problems presented by the incoming alien will be deserving of careful consideration.

CONGRESS AND ITS SOURCE.

(Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

The always amusing Manuel Herrick of Oklahoma, who has been beaten for renomination to Congress, has written, as was to be expected, an amusing letter to explain it. When once a public character has attained reputation for being either a wit or the cause of wit in others, the unthinking will merely laugh at everything he says or does, and this will be the fate of Mr. Herrick's latest forthputting. But, comic as it is, there is food for thought in it, and nearly every voter in nearly every congressional district in the United States would do well to think it over. Enumerating the causes of his campaign, the airplane daredevil, beauty-contest originator and solicitor of mash notes, who for too brief a term has represented Oklahoma in the House, says:

"Most of the voters are dumb driven Cattle during that campaign of 17 days I met men who thought that Dick T. Morgan was still the congressman and that I was trying to take his job away from him and others thought that Charles Swindall the man who served out the unexpired term of Dick T. Morgan of two months and twenty nine days with the congressman and I was trying to take his job away from him and others who thought that Both Me and Swindall was congressman and still others who did not know what was the congressman and did not care."

Mr. Herrick probably does not know it, but he has put his foot on what's the matter with Congress. It is Congress' constituency. Who is your congressman, gentle reader? If you live in a great city, probably you don't know. If you live in the country, probably you know his name and call him "the Judge"; but you don't know whether he's good, bad, or indifferent. If he is good, he doesn't get a chance to serve you very well, because at the end of his second or third term, according to whatever may be the benighted custom of your district, the upper end of it considers that the unwritten law demands that the lower end shall give up the incumbency and pass it northward, or vice versa. If he is bad, you don't get a chance to know what he has done to the nation because of the ready way in which he pushed through the new postoffice or deepened the creek—that is, if yours is a rural district. If he is a city congressman, he doesn't have so much chance to make good at home, for, being a mere tool of the local machine, the House machine holds him in contempt and does not even know his name. Here his only chance to get by is to bring his own local machine down on the head of the House machine, which can only be done by obeying swiftly the orders of the local machine, and can not be done at all unless the local machine is powerful enough to worry the House machine. The country member can get his pork barrel through by refusing to vote for some other measure the House machine wants or by log-rolling with other members.

So the ungrammatical, the misspelt Herrick has hit the nail on the head. It is not his district alone which thinks Swindall or Morgan is still in Congress or "that Both Me and Swindall was congressman." It is all over the United States, in every district. In 1916 a liveryman named Robert Ross, unable to read or write even as well as Herrick, put his name up for President of the United States and got 16,000 votes in the Republican primaries in Nebraska. Most newspapers, unable to believe in the existence of such a constituency, explained it on the ground that the Great American Sense of Humor was at work. Alas! Herrick, with his Swindalls and his Morgans, has supplied the real answer.

Besides, we all knew it before. The evil is most flagrant in great cities, where men may go wild over a sheriff or a mayor without even trying to know who was running for Congress; but it is rampant all over the country. Herrick's district, for instance, is not illustrious for great cities.

THE REAL UNDER DOG.

(New York Tribune.)

The leaders and members of organized labor must be conscious of the great change which has occurred in the public's attitude toward labor unionism. Attorney-General Daugherty expressed a feeling becoming increasingly general when he exclaimed before Judge Wilkerson at Chicago:

"When the unions claim the right to dictate to the government and to dominate the American people and deprive the . . . people of the necessities of life, then the government will destroy the unions, for the government of the United States is supreme and must endure."

Unionists excuse even when their members are probably participants in outrages against life and property. Their leaders apologize for criminal acts. Witness the recent statement of President Farrington of the Illinois mine workers with respect to the Herrin murders and yesterday's defiant declaration of Samuel Gompers that he will not obey court orders. The labor organizations have aroused the belief that in the pursuit of selfish purposes they are contemptuous of the law. Many things other than a flouting of the social bond have tributed to the alteration of the atmosphere. For generations the chief asset of unionism has been the common belief that labor was an under dog. Who thinks this now? We have Czar Lewis of the miners' field and Czar Jewell of the railway shopmen. And czarism is always czarism. Men, when their personal interests are involved, can not be trusted to be just. The love of power as such burns in the breast of the new dictators as it did in the breasts of the old.

The public sees what will be its fate if it does not establish boundaries to greed and arrogance. The great mass of people now realize as they have never realized before that their meagre incomes are clipped to fill the pockets of a conspiring minority. The price of coal gives tangible evidence of the consequence of allowing one labor element to perpetuate war wages.

In other directions education proceeds rapidly. The goods that all create by common labor and out of which all are paid are levied on by those who rapaciously claim to have a first lien. The rest of us are told to be satisfied with the remainder. The public is the under dog.

Moreover, union practice, a practice which has been systematized into a fine art, is deliberately to hamper production, the good mother of us all. By limiting the output per man, by frowning on the admission of apprentices, by opposition to labor-saving machinery, and by countless devices for job multiplication production per man is kept down. The victims of this policy are unionists as well as non-unionists, yet the stupid course is blindly pursued. No wonder there is discontent!

So there is a great awakening. Even politicians are beginning to suspect that the way to popularity is not in complete subservience to unions. Though there is little objection to the union principle itself, an overwhelming protest rises against what the unions in fact do.

THE RUSSIAN TERROR.

(New York Times.)

The number of persons reported to have been executed by order of the Cheka in Russia is incredible. The dispatch from Riga to the London Times states that the figures given are "official bolshevist figures." The total number so reported is 1,766,118. The seeming exactness of this total invites credence, but when the components are examined it is discovered that most of them are in round numbers, the exception being in the number of professors and priests, which are given as 6775 and 1243 respectively. An unhappily confirming statistic as to the latter is found in a statement of the Russian orthodox council issued in early May to the effect that the freedom of worship concerning which Tchitcherin had made declaration at Genoa had not hindered the execution of more than "1000 priests and twenty-eight bishops." The official figures concerning priests, 1243, are so near this number reported by the church as to give a tragic color of truth to the whole list of mortality by occupations, even though most of the statistics are given in round numbers as 8800 doctors, 355,520 "other intellectuals," 260,000 soldiers with 54,650 officers, 12,950 landowners, 192,350 workmen, and 815,100 peasants.

If these figures are dependable, the confessed executions have taken place at the rate of 1000 a day for four years, and have almost equaled in number the losses of the French in battle during the war.

THE SYRIAN SITUATION.

(New York Tribune.)

It seems that a part of the press in the United States has been for some time misinformed, or informed in a mischievous way, as to the real situation in Syria and in Lebanon, says Gaston Liebert, French consulate-general.

The statements or protests of the "Syrian committee" can not really be taken seriously, as they come from a few individuals who have personal grievances following their dismissal or eviction from governmental functions in either Syria or Lebanon. It is inconceivable that assertions such as the one putting the number of that so-called "Syrian committee" at 4,500,000 should receive credence, when the total population of Syria and Lebanon, according to the 1922 census, is only 3,000,000, including the nomad tribes.

As for the 150,000 (?) well-armed partisans who are supposed to be ready to start a "guerrilla warfare" against the French troops in case the French mandate should be maintained, that is one of those prophecies which nobody can reasonably believe in until its realization, which may take a very long time.

Independent of these groundless hypotheses, the news received concerning the recent occurrences in those countries is not more accurate. Der-az-Zor, which, according to a newspaper report of May 19th, was in the hands of the Syrian Arabs, is not only still occupied by our troops, but has increased in importance and in strength. No insurrection has taken place, as announced, among the Arab tribes on the borders of Trans-Jordan. These news items are absolutely false, and it is enough to say so without giving the matter an importance which it does not deserve.

The ill-meant distortion of the Damascus and Homs incidents shows the state of mind from which this sort of information proceeds.

At Damascus, after six days of disturbances, on April 11th last, there were four people wounded and one killed, not by the shells of the motor guns, which fired only blank shots, but by the crowd in effervescence who crushed those unfortunate people.

At Homs, on April 19th, during a meeting of the pupils of the Sultaneh College, which the scum of the population of that city did not fail to attend, the troops had to intervene, a native having fired a pistol at a French officer. Two were killed and three wounded who remained on the spot. The troops, moreover, intervened without arms and the soldiers contented themselves with scattering the crowd with the lashes of their military belts.

The letters or telegrams which are produced in the press of America all come from the same source, namely Cairo, where there are gathered the few factious elements dominated by personal resentment and by the desire of attracting to themselves an importance which neither the Syrians of Syria nor the inhabitants of Lebanon are willing to concede to them.

Education should be sound as well as pervasive, says the Review of Reviews. Nothing is more to be desired and encouraged than the tendency of men who work for wages to study political and economic science. We shall be secure from radicalism and dangerous socialism only by virtue of the trained mentality of our workers. Private property is a beneficent institution in a democratic republic, if conditions are such that every intelligent and industrious man may reasonably hope to become a capitalist to some extent, while also earning wages or salary.

Moissaye Boguslawski, a Russian musician, has a memorized repertoire of 2500 compositions. He has devised a system by which he can memorize any composition in fifteen minutes.

Lieutenant-Commander M. A. Mitscher is selected captain of the navy's team in the coming aerial classic. The team will enter the Curtis and Pulitzer cup races to be held in Detroit in October.

Mrs. Helen H. Gardner is the first woman to head a Federal government department. In the absence of George R. Wales she is acting head of the United States Civil Service Commission.

Sergeant Patrick Collins of the Chicago police force is a brother of the late Michael Collins, the martyred hero of the Irish Free State. The two brothers came together to America, but Michael turned back immediately upon arriving.

Mrs. Charlotte Despard, a pioneer in the suffrage movement in England and a prominent figure in Irish affairs, has announced her candidacy for Parliament. She is president of the Women's Freedom League and Lord French's sister.

Mrs. Ernest R. Grant, director of the Children's Health Crusade, Washington, has during the past four years enrolled 144,000 Washington youngsters. She recently presided at the first international children's health crusade luncheon, which was attended by 600 people, including most of the celebrities of Washington.

Colonel Edward H. R. Green, son of the late Mrs. Hetty Green, despite a recent knee affection which has forced him to the wheel chair for most of his traveling, is still able to go about his estate at Round Hills, Massachusetts. Colonel Green makes his rounds in a tiny electric automobile scarcely larger than an invalid's chair.

Dr. Charles Prospero Fagnani, who was forced to leave Germany several months ago because of his anti-German activities during the world war, is professor of Old Testament literature and exegesis at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. Dr. Fagnani was a teacher in the New York public schools from 1873 to 1879. He was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1882 and was one time pastor of Westminster Church, Yonkers, New York.

Bonnie Gray, the newly-crowned queen of women cowpunchers, is making Lorena Trickey, champion woman rider of the world, look to her laurels. Miss Gray won the fancy riding events at the recent Pike's Peak rodeo, doing the trick which she alone of women riders is said to accomplish—passing completely under her running horse and regaining her saddle. The youngest of them all is Joan Woodbury, the six-year-old San Francisco movie rider, whose bravery in the saddle recently won for her a prize pony.

American viscountesses by marriage are fairly numerous, but Henry Edward Pellew is probably our only viscount. Mr. Pellew, who as a British younger son craved the title, has recently ironically inherited it at the age of ninety-four. The elderly peer hesitated long before definitely accepting the honor, but has finally done so; most probably on his son's account, the Hon. Charles Pellew. Mr. Pellew, as the new peer prefers to be addressed, since he intends to continue his American residence, was in early life one of the founders of Keble College, Oxford. In 1858 he came to America, where in New York he met and married Elizabeth Jay, granddaughter of John Jay, revolutionary leader and first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. After the death of his wife he again came to America in 1873 and married her sister, Augusta Jay. He then became an American citizen. Mr. Pellew is the sixth Viscount of Exmouth, a title bestowed on his ancestor, Admiral Edward Pellew, for valorous services in the American revolution.

Albert Thomas, director of the International Labor Office, is to come to America this fall to study American labor conditions. Thomas, who was French minister of munitions during the war and therefore the French equivalent and colleague of Lloyd George at that time, is a very decided personality. Only forty-four years old now, he was still in his thirties during the period of his war activities to which France owed the tremendous production of seventy-fives and the general efficiency of her munitions department. Thomas was born the son of a small baker in the town of Champigny sur Marne in 1878. As a youngster he traveled and studied in many countries as a result of scholarships won through his outstanding and active mentality. He is the author of a number of sociological books and at one time was a newspaperman. Before his appointment as controller of munitions he was a leader of labor elements in the House of Deputies. In August, 1920, he was appointed director of the International Labor Office, in whose interests he has been traveling ever since. M. Thomas calls himself "the Wandering Jew of social politics."

There have been few men of wealth in Wall Street whose ideas and personality were as little known as the late William Rockefeller's. He could not easily be interviewed, and even those who came in contact with him carried away no clear idea of his opinions. The only time when he was freely quoted, as recalled in Wall Street, was at the time of the "rich men's panic" in the spring of 1907. One story is told of a recent meeting of the directors of one of the largest of the copper companies, of which he was a member. The management had expected to pay the regular dividend; so had most of the directors. The corporation's secretary, being on familiar terms with the newspaper men sent to report the meeting, had distributed among them printed slips announcing the payment of the dividend and its date. These slips were to be "released for publication" at the conclusion of the meeting. Mr. Rockefeller appeared late, just as the meeting was about to break up, and sat at the directors' table less than five minutes, but he evidently had something to say. "The dividend has been passed," later announced the corporation's secretary, collecting the slips he had previously handed out.

THE VITALITY IN MORMONISM.

Searching Study of the Elements of Endurance in the Religion Founded by Joseph Smith.

To most men in this country the mystery of Mormonism will always be how Mormons could support such large families while the rest of us are compelled to struggle along with one wife and just a few children. It does not occur to many persons to investigate Mormon philosophy, and in these days of the high cost of living we are but mildly interested in Mormon theocracy. The mystery is more economic and domestic than it is political or ethical, or even sociological. "The Mystery of Mormonism," by Stuart Martin, does not give the exact prescription from the financial point of view. It does, however, attempt some explanation of Mormonism, and it seeks to place it in American history. Mr. Martin's book can be commended as a good addition to Stenhouse's "Rocky Mountain Saints," which it in on way imitates except as the subject matter compels treatment of the same themes.

Mormonism is a sociological, religious, economic, agricultural, domestic and historical phenomenon that ought to be of considerable interest to any student of American affairs. It is an American religion. It was invented, or discovered, or revealed, to an American, and grew up among Americans, before the foreign influx had raised any doubts as to what a real American might have the luck to be. The Pioneer Monument in the centre of Salt Lake City, surmounted by the statue of Brigham Young with the statue of his walking stick, looking every inch the monarch of all he surveyed, bears on the pedestal the names of about 148 or 150 of those Mormons that first crossed the desert to Salt Lake Valley. The writer of this article stood there recently, near the place where the pinnacles of the Temple and the figure of the Angel Moroni overlook the church's profitable Utah Hotel, and carefully read these names, and there was but one that was not a pure Anglo-Saxon name form—if such thing there be as a pure Anglo-Saxon. Mormonism is an American religion, and the Americans are the sort of people that can produce Mormonism—in all its dips, spurs, angles, drifts, winzes, stopes, aspects dorsal, ventral, and lateral, variations, idiosyncrasies, whimsicalities, logicalities, and all the rest of it. You can not take any broad account of the people of America and count out Mormonism.

Under what circumstances did it begin? We have all read of Joseph Smith and his peep stone and other ways of imposing himself on the ignorance and credulity of his neighbors, but it is well to understand how the field in which he sowed his extraordinary seed had been made ready. On this head the author of "The Mystery of Mormonism" is thus explicit:

Mormonism was evolved at a time when the entire American continent was exhausted by the conflict of philosophical theories and was rent by theological schisms. The country was passing through a soul-racking, confusing era, as Europe had passed through one before her. The unifying influence of a dogmatic authority was moribund, if not already dead, and in its place was a riot of beliefs, the residue of which is still to be observed in the land. America refused to believe in the Divine right of kings or of priests, and clamored for freedom. She obtained freedom, and immediately became bewildered in the multitude of interpretations of that freedom.

Yet, of all the strange sects which sprang up in the United States, the Mormons alone held any considerable ground against attacks, and flourished in spite of them. All other sects have gradually disappeared, or have become so insignificant as to be of no account, for as civilization spread westwards its unifying influence gradually, but very effectively, obliterated them. Mormonism is now considerably modified; but the impetus given it by its founder, Joseph Smith, and the strong, defiant characters who were its leaders and directors in the early days, have carried it far on the current of history.

In considering Mormonism we are dealing with conditions of almost a century back. In 1920 it was a hundred years since Joseph Smith claimed he met the "two glorious Personages" who told him where to dig for the golden plates on a hill twenty-five miles southwest of Rochester, New York. The United States was still a newly-formed nation, and it was not so long since Aaron Burr had the rashness to believe that he might found an empire within its then indefinite borders. Joseph Smith did found a small one, finding his opportunity in the vote-hunting propensities of that ever-blooming modest violet of our institutions, the American politician. After the Missouri persecutions came Nauvoo, which Smith told his followers meant "beauty and rest." If Smith did not know the name of a thing he could always invent a name and then translate it. He was one of the greatest translators that ever lived. He once translated a whole book from the wrappings of a mummy he bought from a circus, and if Champollion had not deciphered the Rosetta Stone it would have been a perfectly good translation yet, and perhaps the only one we ever should have had from the Egyptian. He could have translated Etruscan just as easily, but unfortunately he was shot by a mob before that language had been brought to his notice, so we are without knowledge of Etruscan. But he did have until his death a nice little empire at Nauvoo, owing to the kindness of the politicians. It came about thus:

But the presidential campaign of 1840, more furious than its predecessors, gave the Mormons their opportunity. Smith, previous to and during those tumultuous days, made friends with the leading politicians, while they with equal willingness made friends with him, for he controlled several thousand votes. But to neither party did Smith at first commit himself. He was anxious to obtain certain powers for his city, and he openly stated he would support the party which was the more inclined to aid his people. At length, following a council meeting with his officials, he announced that he intended to support the Whig programme, and the Mormons voted unanimously for the party. But the following year (1841) the Democrats desired much to conciliate the Mormons and secure their vote; and early that year the unparalleled Nauvoo Charter was granted by them. It was a great triumph for the prophet. Never was a more liberal charter given to any city. It gave the governing authorities power to pass all laws "not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States"—a vague enough phrase which could be, and was, interpreted in several ways. The charter came into effect on February 1st the same year. Among its provisions were the appointment of a mayor, four aldermen, and four councilors; a mayor's court, with exclusive jurisdiction in all cases relating to the city; a municipal court, the mayor as chief justice, and power to issue writs of habeas corpus—power which only the judge of the supreme and circuit courts had hitherto held. It also incorporated the militia of Nauvoo into a body called the Nauvoo Legion, besides establishing a court-martial for the Legion not governed by state law.

Our author recounts very interestingly the upbuilding of the hierarchy at Nauvoo, an hierarchy in which Brigham Young was the Lion of the Lord, Parley P. Pratt the Archer of Paradise, and Lyman Wight the Wild Ram of the Mountains. Smith was mayor, judge, editor of the official paper, lieutenant-general of the army and chief director of the town of 20,000 people. Nobody could serve a writ in Nauvoo without his consent. He announced himself as a candidate for President of the United States. The revelation on polygamy came along, the imperium in imperio grew too strong for the stomachs of the neighbors, and the Nauvoo lynching followed, with the destruction of the city and the murder of the prophet. Then came the long trek westward to the Promised Land under the second prophet, Brigham Young. And Mormonism held fast to the principle that it was walking in the shoes of the ancient Hebrews, entitled to a Canaan and begirt with enemies as the Israelites were, which enemies were also the enemies of God. That frame of mind will explain much in Mormon history.

The Israelites had their quail and manna. The Mormons have their miracle in the wilderness, a very beautiful one, and a miracle worth while as it saved a whole people from starvation. Mr. Martin gives this account of a really touching episode:

The most anxious time, however, was the following May and June (1848), when legions of crickets settled on the fields and gardens of the Saints, eating up every blade of the struggling crops. The settlers were filled with dismay at the plague. They organized war on the crickets; they slew millions, and lit fires, hoping to drive them off, and they prayed for relief from the starvation which threatened. All their hopes of surviving had been placed on the harvest which was being destroyed.

Just at the most critical moment, when they were weary of the combat, they were amazed to see flocks of sea-gulls come sailing over the mountains; and at the sight their spirits sank to the lowest. "Here," they said, "are greater destroyers than the crickets." But the gulls began to feed on the crickets. They ate and gorged themselves till they were sick, and then they ate again, devouring the crickets, and thus rescuing the crops. The Mormons held, and still hold, the coming of the gulls as a definite miracle, a direct manifestation of the Almighty's providence towards them, for it enabled them to obtain a harvest. The gull is now a semi-sacred bird in Utah, the shooting of which is forbidden. A monument commemorating the incident has been erected only recently in the Temple grounds at Salt Lake, and a very pretty monument it is.

One of the great epics of American immigration and westward migration was the disastrous handcart expedition:

The immigration from Europe to Salt Lake City had been progressing slowly; but many thousands were still waiting to make the trip from Liverpool, and it was to facilitate the journey of these converts across America that the proposition was advanced to construct small handcarts in which each man could haul his own baggage and provisions. The city of Iowa was the point at which the outfitting took place. There were three companies in all who started on this long journey of over 1100 miles, carts were made in a hurry, many of them being of timber insufficiently seasoned, and were constructed of two parallel oak sticks about five or six feet long, connected by one crosspiece at one end which served as a handle, and several pieces a few inches apart at the other end to form the bed of the cart. This "body" rested on a pair of light wheels, and each person was allowed less than twenty pounds of baggage in the cart, the heavier provisions and tents being hauled in wagons. Five tents and one wagon drawn by three oxen were allowed to each 100 individuals, and about 500 persons composed each company.

The first company made the journey safely, and entered Salt Lake Valley at the beginning of autumn. The second company did not leave till the second week in August. It was composed of 120 able-bodied men, some elderly men, 300 women and children of walking age, and seventy infants of tender years. A prophecy gave the detachment faith in the success of their long trek; but one courageous man, Levi Savage, who had already been to Salt Lake, opposed the journey. He urged that the risk of approaching winter was too great to ignore, and suggested a delay until the spring; but he was reprimanded by the elders for lack of faith, and ultimately this weak company of enthusiasts set out, singing the well-known Mormon hymn of which the two verses are:

A Church without a prophet is not the Church for me;

It has no head to lead it, in it I would not be;

But I've a Church not built by man,

Cut from the mountain without hand, Oh, that's the Church for me, oh, that's the Church for me.

The God that others worship is not the God for me;

He has no parts nor body, and can not hear nor see;

But I've a God that lives above,

A God of power and of love,

A God of revelation, oh, that's the God for me, Oh, that's the God for me, oh, that's the God for me.

Here we have some revelation of Mormon philosophy. The Mormon has a personal God, something the simple faith of mankind in general can visualize and adore. Such a God is probably present to the consciousness of a Mormon as He was to the Israelites, and, moreover, there was a way of communicating with Him, so that through revelation a warrant could be obtained to do whatever seemed necessary for the welfare of the people. Build on that the fact that the office of prophet always fell into the hands of the strongest and most dominant personality and you have reason enough why Mormonism is going into its second century. There was dread of material progress, but Brigham Young faced it thus:

The railroad reached Salt Lake Valley the following year. There had been some opposition among the Saints to the proposal to admit a railroad track into their stronghold; but all objections were ruled aside by Brigham, who boldly declared that "it was a damned poor religion that couldn't stand a railroad." Outsiders confidently predicted that the railroad would end Mormonism; others that it would bring great trade to the community; but it was soon seen that it brought both drawbacks and benefits. The isolation which the Mormons had enjoyed up till then was banished, and financial and social barricades were in danger of being swept away, or, at any rate, were being assailed. To save his flock from the consequences of those dangers, Brigham came to the rescue, and announced that "it was advisable that the people of Utah should become their own merchants." Their temporal supremacy was to be maintained at all costs, and the Zion Cooperative Mercantile Institution was forthwith founded for that purpose. The institution remains to this day the greatest bulwark which the Mormons have against the trade of the Gentiles, securing for them a financial position in the Far West, and aiding them to keep their money among themselves more successfully than any other measure could have done.

To such sagacious management was added a thoroughly gripping ritual which the book professes to set forth in detail from the statements of apostates. In this feature it goes several lengths beyond Stenhouse, who had been a Mormon and perhaps observed obligations not binding on this Gentile author. The latter even describes what is seen by the faithful when taking their "endowment" in the innermost sanctuaries of the Temple overlooking the Utah Hotel. We spare our page a blush over what he says about some early observances, and present these descriptions as very good guidebook material if true; and we see no reason why they should not be:

It is a beautiful apartment, about forty feet long, with a floor of white marble. Round the walls are a great number of doors, half glass, and the only natural light in the room is "borrowed" from outer windows. But the main thing that attracts the eye is the large font in the centre of the apartment. Here all baptisms "for the dead" take place.

The font is of iron, enameled white; it is four feet deep, and can hold 400 gallons of water. The well, several feet under the floor level, is circular, and is tiled with marble; but the font itself is raised from the floor by a flight of steps. Up these the candidate goes, dressed in garments suitable for the immersion, and, after being immersed, walks out at the other end down another flight of steps, and so out of the apartment. Recorders sit near the font to take note of the ceremony. The supports of the font are of the strangest kind. They are twelve life-size brazen oxen with silvered horns. Three face eastwards, three westwards, three southwards, and three northwards. The large font rests on the haunches of these animals, which stand slightly below the floor level, and are surrounded by a gilded ornamental rail. The design is based on the description of the font in Solomon's temple mentioned in the Book of Kings. In these baptismal ceremonies women administer to women and men to men, and dressing-rooms are provided for both sexes not far from the Baptismal Room.

On an average about 300 persons go through the Temple weekly, "working for the dead." But the war and a recent influenza epidemic held up this sacrament, and today this "work" is a year in arrears; but they are now going through at the rate of 600 a week.

"Working for the dead" consists in being baptized for those ancestors who died too early to be baptized in person. They go a long way back. Hence the skill and renown of the genealogical societies of Salt Lake City. The description continues:

The Garden of Eden Room is one of the first the candidate enters during the endowment ceremony. It is an apartment of fair size. The walls and ceiling, which is arched, are beautifully painted to represent Eden. Great clouds stretch across the sky, which is studded also with silver stars. On the walls are woodland scenes, in which birds, beasts, insects, flowers, and trees are reproduced with fine effect. There is a set piece representing the Tree of Knowledge in front and at the side of an elevator upon which the "gods" ascend. The tree seems to be intended for an apple tree, and there is a small shelf fastened at the back whereon is placed fruit for the "temptation" scene. The whole idea is to impress the candidate with a feeling of repose and calm, and this object is well attained.

There are those who say that Mormonism is dying; but Mormonism has been "dying" many times in its hundred years' career, and always it has lived to "die" again. At every crisis up to the present it has been saved from destruction by the unifying, binding power of its leaders. In the old days it had many of those strong, virile characters among its principal men—men who were doers as well as organizers, who spoke to the rank and file in the common language, and were able to rope a steer, or offer up a prayer, or fight for their lives against a pitiless desert. But times have changed, and when Joseph Fielding Smith died on November 19, 1918, practically the last link with those days was snapped.

As a mere matter of interest, Mormonism is worth attention. This book abounds in information, rather than invective.

Blood pressure being one of our most popular ailments, it should assist the "drink water" campaigns of some of our water companies to have it known that the experiments of two London physicians, Orr and Innes, as described in the British Journal of Experimental Pathology, seem to demonstrate that blood pressure can easily be relieved by copious draughts of water.

The first of the Homeric poems is supposed to be about 2850 years old.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending Friday, September 8, 1922 (four days), were $109,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year (four days); $89,700,000; an increase of $19,600,000.

California members of the Investment Bankers' Association of America are going to make sure that Eastern bankers who attend the eleventh annual convention to be held at Del Monte early next month will see California's varied charms. The six special trains have been routed from north to south, includ-

—calls for an investment of upwards of $30,000,000 annually. And the West's potential water-power development, as determined by the engineers, is twenty-two times that of all the thirty-seven states east of the Rockies.

At the last census there were 4,219,000 acres of irrigated land in California, 22 per cent. of the irrigated land in the United States. (That will indeed be a fact for the investment men to ponder upon.) Invested in irrigation enterprises in California is the sum of $194,000,000, a most substantial fraction of the nation's total, $697,000,000.

California highway bond issues aggregate $73,000,000, and with an automobile for every five and one-fourth persons there are enough machines to depopulate the state in one day. The state stands first in ownership of automobiles per capita.

The quiet strength of financial markets during August reflected accurately the best-informed opinion regarding basic conditions. There have been few sensational advances, and about the middle of the month it looked as if pessimistic reports concerning the foreign situation and domestic labor conditions were being given undue weight. Recoveries, however, followed hard on the heel of declines, and the upward trend has been maintained, says R. Berkeley in the Review of Strassburger & Co.

The bond market has been consistently steady, strength in listed obligations being particularly noticeable of late. Higher prices have been established, in some cases new highs.

The demand for higher rates of interest than are now afforded by bonds of the highest grade is being manifested in insistent inquiry for preferred stocks. It is recognized that these are, from every practical standpoint, as safe as many bonds, safer certainly than any but those of the highest grade.

The probability of cheap money during the remainder of the year justifies the expectation that all sound bonds and investment stocks will reach higher prices within the next few months. It should be borne in mind, however, that a bull market does not insure universal advances, any more than a bear market witnesses all-embracing declines. The market has been very much mixed lately and is likely to continue so. But more advances than declines are due.

In the metal markets, copper has remained firm. It is difficult to find anything in the near future that can justify a lower price. Tin is unchanged; while visible stocks have decreased, the probable increase of invisible stocks has induced conservative views.

Cotton and grain have shown signs of unsettlement, for which there are no solid reasons. A misreading of the European situation has been reflected in a weak tendency, in wheat more particularly. Fundamentally, cotton remains in a strong position, and there is no justification for lower wheat levels.

Revenue from all sources for the support and maintenance of the state government alone in California for the year beginning July will total $41,221,000.

Just supposing that the proposed Water and Power Act with its $500,000,000 mortgage on the state should pass. How much would the overhead and annual expenditures for state purposes be increased?

The taxpayers will never be told until the bill comes in.

Hamilton, an Ohio city of 40,000, is almost broke from voting bond issues.

In 1889 it voted $100,000 bonds to build a gas plant. Before the bonds came due more than $150,000 in interest had been paid, and not one penny of the principal.

The gas plant had been abandoned for nine years. In 1894 an electric plant was built from the proceeds of a $100,000 bond issue and $125,000 has been paid in interest.

Other bond issues have been floated for extensions and the income from the plants was never sufficient to pay for operation and reasonable extension, not to mention depreciation, reserve, and sinking funds.

Under public regulation of private utilities, and selling the securities to employees and customers, the property pays taxes and the people share the earnings instead of the taxpayers being loaded with debts as in the case of Hamilton.

that California ranks back East as "the playground of America."

Here are just a few of the facts that will be impressed upon the visitors during their ten-day swing through a cross-section of California mountains, valleys, and ocean rim:

he said the number of men now at work in the shops on the company's Pacific system is greater than the number who went out on strike. All over the line this has been accomplished without hiring any strikebreakers. The men at work are real workmen who desire the work and have accepted the wages, rules, and working conditions laid down by the United States Railroad Labor Board. The men have formed their own union and called it the Southern Pacific Shopmen's Protective League. Of those qualified for this league, over 80 per cent. have already joined. It is plain to any one going through the shops that strike conditions do not prevail anywhere in the shops.

"Our newspaper advertisements are withdrawn because there is no longer a need for them. Good men who know the strike has failed are returning, and we will make the effort to find suitable work for such of our desirable and capable workmen as seek return to the service.

"Two outstanding features of this ill-advised strike are, first, the loyalty of thousands of our men, who, following their own strong common sense, could not be forced into the strike; second, the large number of men, not only anxious to find work, but anxious also to go to work at the wage schedules and under the working rules and conditions laid down by the United States Railroad Labor Board, against which the strike was called."

Henley & Scott announce that they have taken over the business and organization of Miller, Henley & Scott, general insurance agents.

Henley & Scott are Pacific Coast managers for the following insurance companies: Western Assurance Company of Toronto, Canada, British America Assurance Company of Toronto, Canada, British General Insurance Company of London, the Tokio Marine and Fire Insurance Company, Empire State Underwriters of the Agricultural Insurance Company of New York. These companies have combined resources of over $90,000,000.

The Anglo London Paris Company is offering $2,500,000 Imperial Irrigation District 6 per cent. serial bonds in denominations of $1000, due 1935 to 1956, exempt from all Federal income taxes and taxes in California except inheritance taxes.

Imperial is the largest irrigation district in California. About 413,000 acres in the district are under intensive cultivation, and its products are marketed throughout practically the entire year. Climatic advantages coupled with a cheap water supply make Imperial one of the most prosperous agricultural communities in California.

The bonds are a direct obligation of the Imperial Irrigation District; payable out of annual assessments levied and collected under the same authority as taxes; and are secured by a tax lien, ranking ahead of first mortgages on all land in the district.

The Imperial Irrigation District land and improvements are worth approximately six times the bonded debt against it, and its average annual production per acre is over ten times the annual charge per acre for water, bond interest, maintenance and retirement of bonds.

One of the most popular forms of making an attack on capital among labor-union leaders and their sympathizers is to point out the imaginary profits being made by stockholders, who evidently, in the mind of the agitator, are getting rich by keeping down the wages of the much-abused "working man," says the Cleveland Topics.

The Pennsylvania Railroad, which has many thousands of stockholders, has been frequently asked how its employees have fared as compared with its stockholders by reason of the wage and dividend changes made since the pre-war period. The record of this great corporation is typical and is therefore of great value in correctly estimating what thousands upon thousands of stockholders have faced during the past eight years.

Let it be realized that the average stockholder is not a capitalist—he wishes he were—but a plain person who has worked hard, saved his money, and placed it where he hopes it will be safe and will earn reasonable interest. The Pennsylvania stockholders are no different from any others.

In 1914 wages on the Pennsylvania Railroad averaged $850 a year per employee. Today, after all readjustments, including those effective July 1, 1922, they average $1550. Wages are therefore 82 per cent. higher than in 1914, while the cost of living, according to government statistics, is 67 per cent. higher. This means that each of the company's 200,000 employees, on the average, is able to buy considerably more of the desirable and needful things of life than his pre-war wages would obtain.

But the stockholders are in a different position. They number 140,000. Most of them own less than 50 shares each. The average ownership is 71 shares. Before the war 71 shares yielded an income of $213 per year.

reduction, which has been publicly stated, to restore the 6 per cent. rate as soon as that step can be wisely taken, without risking deterioration of the property. Even then the stockholders' incomes will merely be restored as to the number of dollars, but not as to purchasing power, as long as the cost of living remains above normal.

As between the stockholder and the employee of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the burdens of the war have fallen entirely upon the former. The same condition, of course, is true of the railroads in general, and has undoubtedly been an important factor in accounting for the failure of the men, who are at present on strike against the recently authorized very moderate wage readjustments, to enlist the support of the public.

It is, and long has been, the declared policy of the Pennsylvania Railroad to pay its employees the best wages and offer them the most favorable working conditions in the country, or for that matter in the world. The stockholders of the company have consistently supported the management in this policy, in order that loyal, efficient, and satisfied working forces might be maintained, and the public receive the best service possible. Most of the company's men are, and always have been, of this type.

In the present crisis the great majority of the Pennsylvania's shop forces have remained loyal, wisely accepting a conservative wage readjustment which is fair to their interests, and necessary as a measure of justice both to the owners and the users of the railroad. Moreover, among its men there are doubtless thousands whose course of action has been influenced by knowledge of the facts that the railroads have had to accept a reduction in freight rates, and that wages on the railroad, even in a depressed year like 1921, took over 51 cents out of every dollar paid by the public for service.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

There are publishers with a specialty, but Mr. Knopf is not one of them. Three books issued by him during the week bear testimony to the catholicity of his taste and of his publications. Of these, the one that will be most widely read is also the one of greatest merit, Miss Cather's fine new novel, "One of Ours." One which we enjoyed the most is a fantasy by John Peale Bishop and Edmund Wilson, Jr., which smacks of Beerbohm in both title and context, "The Undertaker's Garland." The third is that which shows Mr. Knopf's catholic and liberal mind, for it is neither realistic nor mordantly clever. This last, "Tutor's Lane," has the local interest of being produced by a young Californian, Wilmarth Lewis.

"Tutor's Lane" is most erroneously advertised as being the first American Gilbert-and-Sullivan novel. If one weren't told that its original title was "Birth and Behavior," which all good Gilbert-and-Sullivanists will recognize as being derived from the inimitable authors of our best comic operas—and we confess that we did not recognize it—no memory of those inimitables would ever occur to the reader of "Tutor's Lane." Otherwise, a charming little novel of small town college life not without its dull passages—but what small town or college isn't?—and nowise reminiscent of Gilbert and Sullivan, as we have endeavored to point out.

A truly fresh contribution to American letters is "The Undertaker's Garland." Though it is not so advertised, it is the first Beerbohmian book to claim allegiance to American literature. All of which goes to show that the psychology of plagiarism is as peculiar as any other. If you have not plagiarized you may boast that you have, but not vice versa. However, "The Undertaker's Garland" is almost as good as Max Beerbohm, if not quite. And though obviously influenced by the greatest living exponent of English prose—and who could be a better influence?—its thesis is original. True, it is derived in turn from the Middle Ages, but as there is nothing new under the sun, one's chief hope for a novel appearance is to excavate deep enough to reach forgotten strata for one's origins. Its subject, claim its young authors, is the natural reaction of a generation of writers reared in the late war. And the concluding sentence of their apology is: "Yes: at the darkest point of the Middle Ages, people made a farce of death. To the people of the fifteenth century death itself had more life in it than life has today." "An Undertaker's Garland" is calculated to vivify our deathlike repose. That is to say, it will make you think. But we must not dismiss it with the disparaging imputation of seriousness. Like all great truths, it is amusing.

"One of Ours" will probably be hailed as the great American novel. We are not sure that it is, but it is at least a plausible candidate and it will undoubtedly be nominated to the post by hosts of enthusiastic admirers. To enumerate Willa Cather's literary characteristics would be to catalogue the indispensable ingredients of good literature. We haven't space here for even the terminology. Her technique is very fine, even masterful, although we do not think her a beautiful writer. If she had Mrs. Wharton's flair for fine prose, for example, she would be marvelous. But comparisons are odious even in criticism. And furthermore, if the impossible could be achieved and the best of Mrs. Wharton's and Miss Cather's abilities could be synthesized into a masterpiece with the reality of "The House of Mirth" and the American commonplaceness of "One of Ours," there would still be something lacking—though we should be glad to read the hypothetical marvel. What neither of these ladies' works reflect is the joy of life. Their books are accurate and beautiful reflections of certain phases of our national life, but they are seen as in a glass darkly. Women writers seem doomed to represent life, however successfully, without verve or gusto. That is, serious women novelists. We can think of a dozen lesser lights who have verve enough and to spare for their more serious and significant sisters. However, we present the challenge. Let Miss Cather or one of her runners-up produce a good novel written with gusto. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Many are discussing James Joyce's "Ulysses," but few are reading it, as the book was published in Paris by subscription in a limited edition. Meantime, due to its fame, there has been a revival of the demand for Joyce's other books here and in England. These four volumes represent an unusual variety of genre. "Chamber Music" is a Garland of lyric poetry. The difficulties that surrounded the publication of "Dubliners," a collection of short stories, due to fear of libel—ing an exalted person, made trouble for several printers in London and Dublin; years passed and controversy raged before the book actually appeared. A naturalistic drama,

"Exiles," discloses the talent of Joyce in another phase of refined perfection. Of course, the most significant work is "A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man," which Mr. Huebsch published in America before the book came out in London. It is the precursor of "Ulysses," the latter book being a continuation of the story of Stephen Dedalus, the "artist" of the title.

A British movie company has gone to Iceland to film Sir Hall Caine's "The Prodigal Son."

A volume announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co. on "The Prime Ministers of Britain" will be a book of consequence. It is the work of Clive Bigham, who, beginning with Walpole in 1721, carries the story through two hundred years, ending with Lloyd George in 1921. During that time thirty-six prime ministers have held office, each of whom he studies judicially, analyzing his character, describing his appearance, narrating his personal and official history, and pointing out his influence upon his times. Of each one there is a full-page portrait.

Max Reinhardt, the great German theatrical producer, is to visit this country in November. Among the plays he will stage in New York is "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The Harpers announce an important book of reminiscences by W. A. Rogers, "A World Worth While," to be published this month. Mr. Rogers, who is the successor to Thomas Nast on Harper's Weekly, was head cartoonist of the New York Herald for seventeen years and a friend and contemporary of such men as Abbey, Frost, Reinhardt, Pyle, and Nast. Mr. Rogers drew many of the most famous war posters.

What promises to be a very interesting glance into the "dark backward and abysm of time" is announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co.—"Chaucer and His England," a study of life and times in England in the fourteenth century by C. G. Coulton, a lecturer in English in Cambridge University and author of several volumes dealing with the Middle Ages. The work is illustrated with reproductions of old prints, including the Hoccleve portrait of Chaucer.

Harper & Brothers announce reprints of the following books: "Conflict," by Clarence Budington Kelland; "Gardening with Brains," by Henry T. Finck; "The Car That Went Abroad," by Albert Bigelow Paine; "The Vertical City," by Fannie Hurst; "Souls for Sale," by Rupert Hughes; "The Man on the Forest," by Zane Grey; "The Great Desire," by Alexander Black.

The Harpers report that James Harvey Robinson's "The Mind in the Making" is in its ninth large edition.

Joseph Conrad's wife has written a cookery book which is to be published in England this fall. It is the first literary attempt of the great author's wife.

Apropos of the newspaper lists of the "twelve greatest women," Heywood Brown says in the New York World that he "can not understand why the name of Willa Cather appears on none of them. If anybody has written a better American novel than 'My Antonia,' we do not know of it." "My Antonia," was published in 1918 by the Houghton Mifflin Company.

A new issue at a reduced price is being brought out by the Duttons of their handsome publication of George Gissing's masterpiece, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft."

Edison Marshall, winner of the O. Henry Memorial Award for the best short story of 1921 with his "The Heart of Little Shikara," has written a new novel of the wilds, "The Sky Line of Spruce," published by Little, Brown & Co. He is an author whose title to authority in writing adventure stories of the West is well founded, both in ancestry and in personal experience. The pioneer instinct is in his blood, inherited from forbears who crossed the Atlantic before the revolution. His grandfather went to California in '49; his father was born and bred in a log cabin on the frontier of Illinois. Marshall, the younger, was born in Rensselaer, Indiana, and was educated at the University of Oregon. His own adventure-experience was gained in knocking about in the Cascade Mountains, in the southern Alleghenies, and with the hobo fraternity. One of his trips of observation was into the plantation country of the Louisiana delta, and another was into Alaska, where he narrowly escaped the claws of a monster grizzly. The result of his varied and often perilous experiences has been that Mr. Marshall has acquired an enviable faculty for making vivid his stories of man and beast at close grips in the wilderness.

"The Theory of Relativity," by Albert Einstein, containing the very latest development on the subject, is announced for autumn publication by the Princeton University Press.

Intellectual Standards.

We have fixed standards of monetary value, of weights and measures, of all things in the material world, says Willis Fletcher Johnson in the North American Review. It is startling to deny the need of equally imperative standards in the intellectual and moral world. He must be strangely lacking in vision who does not perceive in our failure to maintain such standards a fecund source of the evils from which the world is suffering. The commercial world would suffer chaos if the monetary standard were abolished; the industrial world would become a bedlam if a pound or a gramme were to be varied in weight according to every individual taste and fancy. We must not lay the flattering unction to our souls that the things which pertain to the mind and spirit are less in need of exact definition and fixed standards, or are less susceptible thereto. There was of old a curse pronounced upon him who removed his neighbor's landmarks. Still more deserving of condemnation are they who tamper with the intellectual and ethical landmarks of humanity.

It is estimated that $1,000,000 a week is advanced in London on pawned articles.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Light on Latin America.

To those that believe in several groupings of the nations, European, Asiatic, and American, as a policy likely to stabilize the world, and one more workable than the effort to get us all into the same bed, "The New Latin America," by J. Warshaw, Ph. D., is likely to supply needed information.

Also, it comes along rather opportunely with the celebration of Brazilian independence. We all know a few things about South America and about Central America, but there is an amazing ignorance in this country of anything valuable or significant on the subject. It does not get us far, for example, to know that the condor of the Andes is the largest bird, or that some of the biggest snakes live along the Amazon. Introducing Rivers of Doubt only confuses the subject. Dr. Warshaw discusses matters that are of pertinent interest. He tells us of industry, of the position of women, of the Latin American attitude toward the more or less Anglo-Saxon American; he goes over the Monroe Doctrine and the growth of nationalism among the Latin Americans. He devotes much space to the subject of education and cultural development. And he tells us something of the current opportunities for Americans. He tries to be practical, and warns us that it is an error to regard Spain as a decadent nation, or that Latin America is a sink of iniquity, or that destructive revolutions are always going on there, or that all the peoples south of the Rio Grande are alike. The population of Mexico, for instance, is heavily Indian, that of Nicaragua is Indian to the extent of seven-eighths of the inhabitants. But these Indian races have produced great commanders and administrators. South of the Caribbean, the Latin peoples do not feel the need of any tuition or guardianship from the United States, and tact and consideration are very necessary to friendly relations. Says the author:

"The future will undoubtedly witness the growth of the A. B. C. alliance as the spokesman for Latin America, and an increased tendency on the part of Latin American countries to seek its good offices rather than to have recourse to European governments or to the government of the United States. . . . To most Latin Americans we are still 'Yankees.' . . . A Latin American who has never seen an American, or has seen only types resembling the national cartoon, will almost necessarily visualize us in the one mold of the New England trader of a past age: and politicians and writers who wish to perpetuate this image of us, along with the invidious phrase 'dollar diplomacy,' will perforce term us yanquis, just as our own unwitting citizens are so often prone to term all Latin Americans 'natives,' 'spigotties,' and 'greasers.' Chauvinism and jingoism are always ready to generalize their animus in the shape of a derogatory catchword or brand." Adaptability is needed and will repay the effort.

The book is well supplied with maps and statistical matter. It is a serious and probably a valuable effort to inform United States Americans about Central Americans and South Americans.

THE NEW LATIN AMERICA. By J. Warshaw. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company; $3.

Upstream.

In "Upstream" Mr. Lewisohn writes with mournful beauty of his childhood in Berlin, with pensive sadness of his boyhood and youth in South Carolina, where he attended a Methodist college that wins some praise, with a mingling of appreciation and despair of Columbia, with acumen of the state universities in which he taught German (he could get no place teaching English literature, he affirms, because he is a Jew), and with fiery indignation of Politics, War, Puritanism, Prohibition, Americanism and Capitalism. He is now dramatic editor of the New York Nation.

Many of us have profited from Mr. Lewisohn's books on modern French and German literature, but we feel that we don't learn a great deal from him in "Upstream" about the living abstractions we have capitalized above. Naturally, he doesn't quite appreciate "Anglo-Saxonism." Less accountably, since he has grown up in it, he doesn't get the American sense of humor. "Muddling along" has served the British Empire; yet he condemns it heartily in us and is almost French in his logical demands upon our opportunist selves. He complains of our ethical duality of conscience and says we must practice a stricter spiritual veracity, lest we die. He hates to see us sneaking about drinking in secret and thinks we are awful sex hypocrites. He wonders if our war mania wasn't due in a way to sex inhibition.

But the vital part of his book, perhaps, is its sections on American university education. Mr. Lewisohn was instructor at the University of Wisconsin for one year and assistant professor at the University of Ohio for eight; so he knows somewhat of what he speaks. And having succeeded as a teacher, he does something more than backbite. Even so, his findings are not reassuring. College presidents are inquisitors preaching college loyalty; college professors are high-minded gentlemen lacking in courage and independence, but very busy with "administrative twaddle"; students are an indistinguishable crowd of youngsters intent on bettering themselves economically and talking fudge and football. As for internal university politics, such as are the curse of certain of our higher institutions, they for some reason escape the particular condemnation they deserve at the author's hands.

What, finally, is Mr. Lewisohn's hopeful note? He says he hasn't any, except that the spirit of criticism is abroad. But why not remember, too, that if we become weary of well-doing, we also get tired of being bad? Abuses die before our Davids can fit their stones to their slings; our Goliaths, too, take to their heels. Yet we should be the last to deny that books like Mr. Lewisohn's assist in their discomfiture.

UPSTREAM, AN AMERICAN CHRONICLE. By Ludwig Lewisohn. New York: Boni & Liveright; $3.

Poems of the Great Game.

The internally warring spirit of man expresses itself, when at its best, in verse, and this disposition is the basis of "Songs of Challenge," an anthology selected and arranged by Robert Frothingham. "Pin us down," he says, "and you'll find that most of us believe in our kinship with the worth-while things, the truly big things, 'the stars which fleck our journey's dusks.' But it's like squaring the circle when we try to weave that belief into the warp and woof of our daily grind. The great majority of us are essentially religious—not theologically, nor doctrinally, and frequently not even intellectually—but in the inner recesses of our spirit, where joy works alone. . . . Here we kneel to 'whatever gods may be' and strive to play the game." And of such strife are such poems made as Frothingham presents in this little handy volume. Here we find old friends such as Wordsworth's "The world is too much with us," Owen Meredith's "There is no unbelief," and Edwin Arnold's "After Death in Arabia." One notes the absence of such fine things as Sill's "The Fool's Prayer," and La Hire's Prayer, though both should surely have had place here—but no anthology is complete according to any one person's idea except that of the anthologist, and we note several other prayers, so perhaps there are enough. Among the haunting verbal melodies offered us is William Johnson Cory's "Heraclitus": They told me, Heraclitus, they told me you were dead.

They brought me bitter news to hear and bitter tears to shed.

I wept as I remembered how often you and I Had tired the sun with talking and sent him down the sky.

And there is that other fugitive thing reminiscent of Villon, "Tis All and Nothing":

Write on a ruined palace in Kashmir: "The end is nothing, and the end is near."

Where are the voices kings were glad to hear? Where now the feast, the song, the bayadere? The end is nothing and the end is near.

These convey an idea of the quality of verse that has appealed to the collector in a theme that makes for a quite remarkable unity of thought and feeling. Here meet Charles Badger Clark, Jr., Don Marquis, Bliss Carman, Louise Imogen Guiney, Matthew Arnold, Thoreau, Burton, Stevenson, William Winter, Eugene F. Ware from Kansas and Will H. Ogilvie from Australia—a truly catholic gathering. Edwin Arlington Robinson is represented with his "Peace on Earth," and John D. Swain with "Villon's Regrets":

One perfect lily grew for me,
And blossomed on another's breast;
Others have clasped the little hands
Whose rosy palms I might have pressed:
So as I die, my wasted youth
Mocks my dim eyes and fading breath—
Still, I have lived! And having lived
That much is mine—I mock at Death.
I should confess, you say. But yet—
Only for Life have I regret!

There is much comfort in this book for a rainy day, and for any day; the stimulus and elevation of sound verse.

The Detour.

Owen Davis has been best known as a writer of plays of purely melodramatic intent, but "The Detour," a wide departure from his previous methods, shows the real perception that was dwelling all the time under the fictitious.

For "The Detour" is a real play of real people. There is not a false note in it. Its theme—that of the dream, idyllic or otherwise, which is necessary to us all—is of universal appeal, and the simplicity of the farmhouse setting, the characters, and the life that is being lived make it intensely real, yet guided by the pathetic yearning for the ideal.

From his experience in writing plays of less worth, somehow the author has evolved a knowledge of human character, a mellowness of outlook, a tolerant, kindly humor, and an ability to fuse his materials into a deeply dramatic presentation of life that places him at one bound in the upper ranks of our native dramatists.

The story shows a group of rural people, each engrossed in his or her special and widely varying dream. There is conflict, for a father opposes his paternal will to the dictum of the aspiring mother that their only child shall go to New York to escape the toils and restrictions of farm life. Nature, however, plays her part, and the girl, as did her mother before her, chooses the life of domestic obscurity glorified by love. And the baffled mother incorrigibly dreams on; but this time of grandchildren.

Calaveras and Pulgas

Calaveras means "skulls." Pulgas means "fleas." Calaveras is the name of a valley that spans the boundary line between Alameda and Santa Clara counties. Pulgas is the name of an old Spanish grant in San Mateo County.

Calaveras and Pulgas summarize present activities in connection with the cooperative programme to provide more water for San Francisco.

That programme moves forward with steady progress. Here are the outstanding features:

Spring Valley is engaged actively at the eastern or Alameda County end of the water route; the city of San Francisco at the western or San Mateo County end.

Spring Valley is adding to the height of Calaveras Dam so as to provide an additional 24 million gallons of water daily for this city. The company will follow this work with the construction of an aqueduct to Irvington.

San Francisco is building the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, beginning with the driving of Pulgas tunnel from Redwood to Crystal Springs Reservoir.

Spring Valley must amortize the cost of its work at the eastern end of the route, to the end that if the city buys Spring Valley after the amortization is effected, the cost of that work will not be added to the price.

Spring Valley must pay the interest on the bonds sold by the city to build the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit.

Spring Valley must pay the city for the use of the conduit.

Before long, work on the project to increase your water supply from Spring Valley sources will be humming all the way from Calaveras to Pulgas and Crystal Springs.

THE NEW CURRAN.

At the opening of this classically beautiful playhouse, with its air of sumptuous dignity and its suggestion of being built to house the very best in dramatic art, everybody who could possibly squeeze in worked his passage, and the new theatre was full to bursting.

The audience contained many of our most eminent citizens and there were stacks of flowers handed up to the stage at the appropriate time.

The theatre, which has many of the most modern features, carefully studied acoustics, a sunken orchestra pit, reflected illumination, conveniences for immediate use as a picture-play house, has also the additional feature of allowing those seated in the proscenium boxes to see, as well as hear, which will be very gratifying to the beauties who ornament stage boxes by their loveliness, only to lose, in many theatres, the possibility of having a complete view of the performance. And they may lay the flattering unction to their souls that they will be seen under a golden proscenium arch of such unusual beauty that their own beauties can not but be heightened in such a favorable setting.

It can not be said that the play, "Mike Angelo" by name, was quite up to the occasion, and the members of the company are merely feeders to Leo Carillo. But Mr. Carillo, with his air of youthful ingenuousness, his pronounced magnetism, his fascinating Italian accent, and his instinctive charm, was really the central rallying point. Plainly the play was written all about him; his Latin appearance, his quick, unforced dramatic expression, and the quality he possesses of pleasing the great majority.

Edward Locke, the author, showered nearly all his choice lines on Mike Angelo, showing considerable ingenuity in giving a comical twist and a child-like guilelessness to Mike's clipped English. Author and actor in combination never failed to move the audience to laughter at the intended moment.

In fact it is a Leo Carillo week, the actor being such a popular favorite that he will prove a good drawing card in spite of some defects in the play and a company that fails to call for any special remark.

"Mike Angelo" will of course have to submit to the blue pencil, and vigorous excision of Newton Carlton's and Peter Smith's rather long platitudes in the last act. The studio atmosphere is sufficiently well indicated, although I question if people in real studios dance a ring-around-a-rosy as frequently as they do in stage ones. The company, too, is much given to standing around listening, in rigid attitudes, and with too fixed and almost respectful attention to Mike's fascinatingly guileless self-revelations. That, however, is a matter that the stage director can easily remedy.

I think it was a mistake to have two characters cast with foreign accents. One ought to be sufficient, especially when it is one of the main attractions of the piece.

San Franciscans like novelty. The Arthur Maitland Theatre and the old Alcazar had to retire for lack of sufficient business, but the backers of the new enterprise have an auditorium that can seat 1800 persons, and they will fill it with those that like happy endings and will confidently rely on getting it.

"THE REAR CAR."

They should put up a large sign at the Columbia containing the announcement: "This play is a farcical take-off on 'Bats.'" Thus spectators who have not previously informed themselves will know what it's about. People who go to the Columbia unexpectedly see the curtain rise on a dark stage; pitch dark. Then they hear a woman scream; scream upon scream. It seems like Frank Norris' story of the lion-tamer who was killed by his savage charges when the lights went out. They look at each other—or vainly try to in the dark—with startled eyes, thinking they have stumbled by chance on a play stuffed with melodramatic horrors.

Not having known in advance that Edward Rose, the author, had amused himself and was seeking to amuse the public by making game of the popular fad for plays modeled on "The Bat," some time is lost before they catch on and begin to grin.

The play is a queer mix-up, no mistake, and not universally funny; for there are some brands of humor that do not reach all lovers of the ridiculous.

"The Rear Car" is unquestionably ridiculous, but its humor is not always authentic. It seems to me that Richard Bennett is rather wasting his powder and shot on it, as he is not a farcure by vocation, and he does know how to act. Perhaps a troupe of skillful farceurs could have made "The Rear Car" funny from the start, but bewilderment in an audience is a mistake. They may be artfully tricked, misled, and surprised, but they should never be allowed to founder.

The things that contribute to this state of mind were a series of the events and incidents that make up plays like "The Thirteenth Chair," "The Bat," and various mystery stories; unexpected faces, and appearances like the hand turning off the light in "Grumpy." But the various incidents being unrelated, the burlesque was only funny in lightning flashes.

Perhaps, however, Richard Bennett regarded the play as a light interlude between heavier pieces, for, in spite of the theatricality of "The Fool," it calls for serious treatment and has made quite an impression on some auditors with susceptibilities to religious drama.

WORDLESS FILM PLAYS.

Every once in a while one sees a play on the screen that has a noticeably small number of sub-titles, or of explanatory text. This, evidently, is an effort on the part of scenario writers to work toward a new goal: a picture play that tells its story so graphically, and with such fine continuity, that words are needless.

Whether this consummation is to be wished we do not yet know. But the comparatively few artists among those who have to do with picture-play production are interested in the idea, for it would mean better pictures, a gain in time, and, above all, better acting. For there is no question as to the tendency of the subordinate players in the movie business showing a trend, like their peers in the spoken drama, toward the deadening methods of stereotype.

There would need to be some overhauling, no doubt, of present method used in movie scenarios. But that is bound to come in any case, as the method of working out picture plays does not stand still. We have but to pause, reflect for a few moments, and compare the first-class picture plays of the present epoch, pieces of real magnitude, with those we were enjoying uncritically a dozen years ago. Indeed, it would not be at all a bad idea for some movie theatre proprietor, or some producer, to revive an old favorite of that era in order to place it on the same programme in contrast with the best work of the present time.

It is worthy of note, by the way, that the loss in time in giving the spectators in a movie house full opportunity to read all the explanatory text is considerable. The commensurate gain, therefore, would perhaps allow for a more leisurely enjoyment on the part of the audience of many beautiful stage pictures presented. For one of the trials, in the peaceful and silent atmosphere of a picture play theatre, is the speed with which they race the pictures over the screen. The tenderest consideration is paid to the slower readers of the text. They must never be made to feel that they are not considered. But in many of the plays there are really beautiful pictures full of interesting detail; pictures such as the court scenes in "The Three Guardsmen." It is not only exasperating to see such pictures, that are like copies of famous paintings, hurried off the screen, but it is a downright loss.

Several experiments have been made in giving picture plays without text; two have been seen, and not so very long ago, by the movie fans, "The Swimm'g Hole" and "The Journey's End." This means that others will follow; and next it remains to be seen how kindly the public will take to the innovation.

THE BOG-LIGHT OF PLAY WRITING.

I am speaking entirely within the bounds of probability, says James L. Ford in the New York Tribune, when I say that at the present moment there must be at least a million individuals devoting all or a part of their waking hours to the construction of what they imagine are plays. In this great army are representatives of every business, profession, and mechanical craft, and if the time they have wasted had been employed in some simple work of agriculture like picking huckleberries or digging potatoes the cost of living might have been materially reduced.

The persistent harping on the earning capacity of the American dramatist that has been going on ever since Clyde Fitch ran his brief meteoric course across the theatrical horizon has proved of incalculable harm to a credulous generation of money-hunters. It has created the widespread delusion that the writing of plays is one of the most lucrative and easily mastered callings that ingenious youth can embark in, whereas we have only to compare the gross amount of the royalties paid each year to playwrights with the number of those engaged, more or less successfully, in writing plays to realize that it is the most poorly recompensed of all occupations.

Bartley Campbell and Bronson Howard may be accounted the earliest of the race of modern playwrights whose emoluments have become a matter of such unfortunate notoriety.

Bartley Campbell's "My Partner," with its conspicuous "actor-proof" scene, was a notable production, for it proved the value of the playwright to be at least equal to that of the star. The same may be said of Mr. Howard's "Banker's Daughter," which had been given two or three times under as many different names before it received the help of A. R. Cazauban at the Union Square Theatre. The author thought himself fortunate when Mr. Palmer agreed to pay him $25 a night for his play, as indeed he was, for it paved the way to a successful career, and it is said that "Shenandoah" yielded him a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars. Campbell continued to write popular dramas, but the low scale of royalties disgusted him, and in time he became his own manager and producer, till the toil and anxiety entailed by the two dissimilar offices drove him out of his mind and eventually led to his death.

It was Charles Frohman who inaugurated the custom, now universally followed, of paying the dramatist a percentage of the gross takings instead of a flat royalty, and of this beneficent policy Clyde Fitch was one of the first to profit conspicuously. In his adroit hands that which a simpler generation had regarded as a profession became a business, and he followed it with efficiency and industry, reaping large pecuniary harvests and implanting hopeless ambitions in thousands of young souls. The influence exerted by Frohman and Fitch was far more extensive and disastrous than is generally known.

The lure of prospective money making, coupled with the magical illusion of the footlights, unseated reason in the heads of the vast number who wished to get rich quickly and without hard labor, and caused an epidemic of playwrighting that has raged ever since with steadily increasing malignity. To the many elective courses that make easy the path of the lazy student up the heights of Olympus, far-seeing college presidents hastened to add that of dramatic construction, which attracted countless eager students, and at the same time persons without any education save the most meagre convinced themselves and their immediate relatives that playwrighting was easy for the strong wrist.

The result of this was to create a sort of will o' the wisp which the incompetent have followed to the neglect of better opportunities. No estimate can be made of the numbers engaged in this futile pursuit, of the vocations abandoned or the careers ruined by following this ignis fatuus, but it is safe to say that of the hundred-odd millions who constitute our population there are very few who have not at least considered a try at the calling that involves so little work and holds out promise of such great rewards.

The modern corsetless, golf-playing, swimming, riding, dancing girl looks like a pretty fine physical specimen—much finer, any one will grant, than the long-skirted, tightly-laced Victorian lady, whose most violent exercise was croquet, says the Ohio State Journal. Probably there are many women, necessarily of the leisure class, who overdo the sport fad. But unless English women are very different from the American women, there aren't many so strenuous. And it isn't likely that the most enthusiastic sportswoman ever tires herself quite so much as the active housewife of the middle classes, particularly in these house-cleaning times. It is no sport to carry a big mattress out in the yard for airing or to drag out the rugs; and who has heard scientists worrying over the future of the race on account of these little stunts?

Tibet's area is 463,200 square miles.

WAS HAMLET SHAKESPEARE?

The hypothesis that Shakespeare composed "Hamlet" in order to expose a court scandal, and inveigh against glaring sins of the times, is not supported by any evidence whatever; at least Professor Thompson produces none, writes Horace Furness, Jr., the eminent Shakespearean scholar, in the North American Review. We should be furnished with facts as to Shakespeare's source of his knowledge. We should be shown that Shakespeare was smarting under rebuffs from those high in office, and thus divulged state secrets out of spite. We should be shown that Shakespeare's particular animus was against Leicester, and should be told the incidents which aroused it. Without this information there is no reason why Shakespeare should rake up concealed facts in a case which had been discussed and sifted almost before he was born—Amy Robsart died in 1560—and throw out veiled hints accusing the principal agents, one of whom, Leicester, had died ten or twelve years before Shakespeare wrote his play. What person then witnessing the play would cast his memory back thirty years or more and at once apply some obscure reference to a case which had long since ceased to excite any interest? Furthermore, even had Shakespeare openly avowed his belief in Leicester's guilt, who would have paid any attention, or attached any importance, to the words of a young playwright, who at that date, 1598, was only beginning his career?

Mention is made of but two Quartos, 1603 and 1604, as appearing before the Folio of 1623, whereas there were three others, one in 1605, one in 1611, and one undated, a clear witness to the great popularity of the play, although Mr. Thompson several times refers to it as but "caviare to the general." The Quarto of 1604 is evidently a rewritten version of the play as it appeared in 1603; there are many additions and some omissions. But when Mr. Thompson declares that "it is an inescapable conclusion that in the revised version Shakespeare introduced a large element of the personal equation," it is taking for granted that we know just what that personal equation might be. Did Shakespeare ever show himself completely? Such phrases as "beyond doubt," "it is quite certain," are somewhat dangerous when applied to a theory touching Shakespeare's creations, and are apt to excite antagonism, in place of acquiescence. Until we have more positive evidence of Shakespeare's own character I, for one, shall not accept this dogmatic assertion that Hamlet is Shakespeare.

Again: "In a play purporting to be based on actual history it was natural, even inevitable, that Shakespeare should have women in contemporary allusions or incidents which, however much metamorphosed in the drama, nevertheless were recognized as familiar by the audience." This is, of course, true to a certain extent. The chance mention of some actual incident, whereof the date is known, is one of the few ways we still have of establishing the date of composition of any play. But it is the despair of the historian that of these historic allusions Shakespeare has far fewer than any of his contemporaries. He seems to have been so immersed in his own story and drama that the everyday events passed him by almost unregarded. Still less is it likely that he should have traveled back thirty years and more to cast out obscure allusions to an incident which few among his audience would be likely to recall.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Rapid in action is the melodramatic farce, "The Rear Car," which started on a two weeks' run last Monday night and ever since has been giving large audiences a mixture of thrills and laughs. Edward E. Rose, the author, is to be congratulated upon having Richard Bennett cast for the "deflector," the sort of butter-in who mixes up the already complicated conditions existing on the private car conveying the long-lost heiress to her father. Bennett has done a number of dramatic rôles with success, but this is the first instance in which he has come out as a farceur. His success is in nowise less brilliant than in the other line of stage work. He is supported by a large cast which gives the necessary melodramatic touch to the scenes of this mystery drama spoke of as "battier than 'The Bat.'" It will be offered for the last time Saturday night, September 23d, and is not to be played elsewhere in California, Bennett leaving immediately for New York to open his season there.

The stage success, "Nice People," will be the next offering at the Columbia Theatre, opening there on Monday night, September 25th, with Mary Newcomb in the stellar rôle. This is the Rachel Crothers play that created so much of a stir on Broadway.

The Players Theatre.

Unusual interest centres in the announcement by Reginald Travers and William S. Rainey of the continuation of their special season of worth-while plays at the Players Theatre, Bush Street near Gough.

A series of five distinctive and attractive plays will be offered, beginning with Ossip Dymov's Russian drama, "Nju," which will be given its San Francisco première next Monday evening with Evelyn Vaughan in the name part.

Another novelty is Philip Moeller's comedy, "Madame Sand," which deals with the escapades and amours of that interesting personage. It was a starring vehicle for Mrs. Fiske recently in New York, but has never been seen in San Francisco. Mabel Gump is cast for Madame Sand.

In response to numerous requests, Francis Powers' colorful tale of San Francisco's Chinatown, "The First Born," will be given, with a sparkling comedy by John Jex entitled "Violet Souls" as a curtain raiser.

An elaborate revival of "Romeo and Juliet" and the first production of a new play by Charles Caldwell Dobie, at present called "Doubling in Brass," complete the series.

The regular Players Club season will start in November, upon the completion of the Rainey-Travers series, and will also consist of five plays new to San Francisco. Season subscription tickets for the entire ten productions are now being offered at reduced rates.

The Orpheum Next Week.

The public is well acquainted with Hobart Bosworth on the screen. Those who remember him on his last appearance at the Orpheum will be surprised to see him in a character which is an antithesis to the Sea Wolf. "Jes' Buck," which Mr. Bosworth wrote himself, is as great a comedy as "The Sea Wolf" was a drama.

The announcement that Rae Samuels is coming will give every one who goes to vaudeville a thrill. Her personality and song numbers are treats which she brings too seldom. D'Amore Franklin and Douglas Charles with Ethel Truesdale contribute a liberal surprise of the good things of the theatre.

"The Dizzy Heights" is a great domestic comedy in which Anderson and Burt spend their honeymoon in the Alps. The skit is packed with laughs.

Quite the most tantalizing toes which have tickled the terpsichorean tastes in a long time are those of the Mellette Sisters.

A laugh with every chug of the motor is the record of "Fields' Family Ford."

Swartz and Clifford have a distinctive way of getting over their popular melodies and clever nonsense.

The Bieserts are sensational cyclists who make every moment a thrill.

The Circuit's Third of a Century.

It will startle many an old-timer to be told that the Orpheum has been dispelling gloom in San Francisco for a third of a century. But so are we getting on. The Orpheum Circuit, from a beginning in this city, spreads today over fifteen states and the western part of Canada, and is preparing to celebrate the completion of a third of a century of progress and achievement. The anniversary date falls in the week commencing Sunday, October 22d, and during that seven days Orpheum theatres, north and south, east and west, will be resplendent with flags and crowded with patrons.

Thirty-three and a third years ago, two young San Franciscans, Martin Beck and Morris Meyerfeld, Jr., conceived the idea of this circuit of theatres. Their assets consisted of the lease of a small show house, a few hundred dollars in cash, their energies, and an idea. They spent so much on decoration and on items of cleanliness and comfort that rival managers shook their heads and made bets on the time that would elapse before they found the sheriff in possession; but the public surged to the box-office, and kept on surging. Los Angeles beckoned to them, and soon a theatre in that city was under their management. Thence the circuit rapidly spread.

In San Francisco realty values increased in the vicinity of the Orpheum, and no mistakes were made in the purchase of sites in any of the cities of the circuit. Vaudeville was elevated by adopting the policy of clean, bright shows, so success attended from both directions. The circuit extends from San Francisco to Chicago, and from Winnipeg to New Orleans, and generally speaking it books the best light entertainment that offers in New York or London. Altogether, it is an institution in which San Franciscans can take pride as well as pleasure, and regard with some of the affection that attaches to memories of the long ago.

It took a trip to the States, and to Washington, for that matter, for a man from the Panama Canal Zone to have an undesirable encounter with mosquitoes, says the Washington Post. Contrary to whatever notions any one may have concerning the tropical nature of Panama in contradistinction to our own part of the country, the mosquito does not exist now in Panama, but is frequently met outside, according to Richard M. Davies of Panama. "Panama has been rid of the mosquito entirely," says Mr. Davies, "and with it has gone the malarial troubles which for many years were rampant in that country. Strange to say, during my present trip to the States I have been bothered on several occasions with mosquitoes, and it was a new experience, since the country along the Canal has been completely rid of them. There are sporadic cases of malaria, as you will find them no less in sections much farther north. But the mosquito and malaria as a disease generally suffered over the country have been eliminated from Panama. I find that some persons in the States have peculiar ideas about Panama. I met one man who believed that the country was largely a swamp. And the surprising fact of the matter was that he had visited Panama. There is not a swamp there. It is a hilly country and is dry and anything but a country of swamps. There is not the hustle that is found in the large cities up this way. You can take life easy, and the populated sections are more like small towns, where everybody knows all about everybody else."

The etymology of "Yule" proves the Pagan origin of this Christmas custom of the Yule festival. The feast of the sun god Thor—always celebrated in Saxon days at the winter solstice—was termed Giul, the signification of which was ale, and of this word Yule is a corruption.

Red-haired persons are said to be less subject to baldness than others. But is it worth it?

BALTIC STATES IMPROVE.

That the help given to Northwestern Russia in 1919 and 1920 by America played an important part in stamping out the Bolshevik spirit in that district is the conviction of Colonel Edward W. Ryan, who for the last four years has had charge of all American Red Cross activities in the new states of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, bordering on Riga Bay, says the New York Times. Colonel Ryan has just reached New York after eight years medical and relief work in various countries of Europe. Conditions in Kovno Reval and adjacent territories, where in 1920 and 1921 the Red Cross was feeding 36,000 refugees, have improved so much that the inhabitants of the Baltic states are not only now raising plenty of food-stuffs for their own use, but are exporting flax and timber.

"They have balanced their budgets and as far as production is concerned are economically independent," said Colonel Ryan, discussing the rehabilitation of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. "In 1919, when we first went into Riga, the people were in a dazed, disorganized, helpless state. They were groping in the dark, not knowing what would happen from day to day and not caring much. From January to May of that year Bolshevik propaganda was strong, and it was only through dogged work that these three countries are not today in the deplorable state of Russia."

"At the time of the Kronstadt revolution many of them escaped across the ice and reached Finland. There they were fed and cared for by the Red Cross, and eventually were able to return to their country. The first national army of 250 men, which did some hard fighting in those days driving back the Bolsheviks, has now increased to 60,000. With the exception of the southern border of Lithuania, where it joins Poland, there is comparative peace through the Baltic states. But along this border the Poles are aggressive, and it will be necessary for the Lithuanians to be mobilized for some time to come."

"Most of the officers in this army received their education in Petrograd and Berlin and are very intelligent. They are well trained and disciplined. It was only through the clever organization of disjointed forces that the strongest leaders were able to pull together the nucleus which later played so important a part in the formation of an independent government. In 1917 the seven or eight million inhabitants of these three countries were as uncertain of their future as the other 100,000,000 people in Russia. Even after the recognition of the Baltic states by the League of Nations, sporadic revolutions kept those countries in a chaotic and unsettled condition. Only now that a degree of normality has been reached is the feeling of unrest developing into something more stable, more durable and lasting."

"To many of those people war is normal and peace abnormal. This is true, not only in the Baltic states, but all through Europe. Boys have been leaving their schools and classes since 1914 to go into the army. To them war is the natural life. They can not go back to school now to finish an interrupted education—as they are demobilized they must look around for a new trade, a new profession. The Baltic states, as well as other states, have this problem confronting them. That they have, with the Bolsheviks continually knocking at the door, been able to stabilize their trade, start their schools, and reestablish industry is greatly to their credit. Had they had the indolence and procrastination of the Russians of Central and Eastern Russia, this would not have been possible. But they are a naturally thrifty, hard-working, industrious group."

What Makes a Playwright?

A flair for the stage is a gift that the Fairy Godmother seldom brings to the christening, says James L. Ford in the New York Tribune. It was the birthright of Dion Boucicault, whose "London Assurance" was produced with sensational success when he was nineteen years old, and, as it was as difficult then as now for an unknown to obtain a hearing, we may infer that he wrote it at the age of eleven. It is a rare thing to find this extraordinary aptitude for dramatic creation in the cultivated mind, and we have only to read the essays on the drama penned from time to time by erudite scholars to become convinced that the whole subject lies beyond the comprehension of academic thought.

The education of the successful dramatists has been that of life rather than of books. The last man to learn the art is the literary expert, because he can not escape the thrall-dom of fine writing, which is a far cry from construction. An accomplished playwright once told me that a watchmaker possessed the best natural gifts for the craft, as every wheel in a watch served a useful purpose in making the wheels go round, and to remove one or add a new one would ruin the whole works.

And while the few have acquired or inherited the knack of scene-building, the other million of college professors, carpenters, lawyers, undergraduates, gasfitters and mercantile clerks are blindly following the iguais fatuus of the stage, leaving in its place only disillusionment and the consciousness of a profitless career.

Gentlemen of the Chorus.

Why are chorus men? used to be a question asked by theatre-goers, but it has finally been answered—because it means a job, says a London cable to the New York Herald. As several theatres are giving preference to men who served in the war, chorus work for men has been given a new dignity. And the fact that the rôles of chorus men are being filled by real men who have proved themselves such makes a difference widely observed on the dark side of the footlights in London theatres.

At Daly's Theatre, where Harry Welchman is starring in "The Lady of the Rose," there is a male chorus which includes two ex-majors and five captains as well as others of lesser military rank, but no less respected in the war days. In the play they do a parade and nothing like it has ever been seen done by stage soldiers before. They are soldiers first and chorus men by necessity. When Welchman snaps his commands they click their heels together and give a remarkable performance. At the same time they take real pride in their work.

One ex-major in this chorus commanded a horse artillery battery and was gassed in France. Captain "L. P." went out with the West Kentish regiment; Captain "C. P. P." with the Indian cavalry, and Captain "R. R. M." was at Saloniki. His pals call him the "commercial traveler" because the only line he speaks is "Yes, we are only waiting for orders."

Lord Leverhulme and America.

In an article in the Westminster Gazette that would warm the cockles of a prohibitionist's or an efficiency expert's heart Lord Leverhulme indicates the superiority of Americans over Englishmen in practicing the habits of sobriety, diligence, and early rising, says the Living Age. To be sure, he hastens to add the British have many points of superiority that he deems it more politic not to divulge. The important thing is that breakfast is served in New York hotels at 6 o'clock and that barber shops open at the same hour. This impresses the Britisher, for London's culinary and tonsorial artists do not embark upon their day of toil until eight. Americans undoubtedly have the habit of work, and if material prosperity is the greatest thing in life, surely we are the greatest nation in the world. Lord Leverhulme is also impressed with the way young Americans with large inheritances buckle down to work, whereas a young Englishman with even $5000 a year income is certain to spend his life in leisure. He also points, as his countrymen frequently do, to our enormous gold reserve, but graciously adds that America's good habits are her real reserve of gold. The noble lord finds that Japan, too, is more progressive than his own country, and he expresses the opinion that England should imitate the industrious habits of the Oriental nation before undertaking missionary reform there.

VANITY FAIR.

The sale of "Tait's" last week to a syndicate originating in the land of citrus fruits and cafeterias appears, to many a soulful Bohemian, to mark the passing of the typical San Francisco French restaurant. As a matter of fact, the San Francisco French restaurant has not yet altogether passed, and Tait's was not a faithful type of the class, being quite too proper; but there is some truth in the theory that times have changed, inasmuch as times are always changing, and that San Francisco no longer presents its vices to the world in the same fearless and seductive forms as of yore. And that is enough to excite the fear that it has passed its most full-blooded and fiery youth, and begun to enter upon the time of life which the Frenchman described as "the sad days when our vices begin to desert us." For it can not be denied that the old French restaurants of several stories, where the higher the story the lower the morals, have almost departed. It is not altogether due to our beloved Brother Volstead, either, for the process began before the general dessionation, and was probably started by the rise in living costs. But memory remains. There was the one where the elevator man wore diamonds for keeping his mouth shut. It began in the earliest of early days, with a canine name, and after many shifts of base reached its apogee on the corner made famous by Spider Kelly. (The Spider, by the way, had some good sporting instincts, and attended the Volsteadian auction of his bar furnishings with his usual personal sign-manual in evidence: a small piece of ice held in his left hand, perhaps to refrigerate his overwarm heart.) And then there was the one built on Mason Street after the fire, when the motor-car had begun to exert its influence even on the oldest and least respectable institutions. Behind a side door it had an automobile runway leading to the rear, where an automatic elevator waited, and veiled ladies could reach the upper levels without attracting notice. Why? We do not know, and not knowing can not say, as the old lady put it. But we do mind us of the observation of the late Reuben H. Lloyd: that "no woman ever went upstairs in a French restaurant to say her prayers."

Eating in a San Francisco French restaurant made you feel wonderfully wicked and filled you with good food—the best ever cooked anywhere in the world. No Roman emperor with an imported Greek cook ever dined as San Franciscans used to dine in their own restaurants with their imported French cooks. If you don't believe it you have an excellent chance of comparison—there are plenty of Greek restaurants. The wicked feeling operated as a tonic. The French cook knew his business. The raw materials of the feast—fish, flesh, fowl and fruit—were the most luxuriant and full flavored ever caught in the sea or grown upon the land. The wines that ripened in our beautiful coastal valleys—oh, gosh, how can we continue? One of the strange things about these places was the impeccable respectability of the lower floor, a feature never understood by any Eastern visitor. But here the San Franciscan took his wife, and could without embarrassment meet another San Franciscan with his. The wickedness of the rest of the place was a thing that could be swallowed with the soup. Why fuss about it? Those were the good days, not only of good cooking, but of the social theory that your fellow-citizens' morals were none of your business; an attitude of mind it is growing harder and harder for the public to maintain before the growing example of governmental interference with everybody's business. Another marked feature was the "French bread," baked in the same good way by one bakery in this city since 1853. Not only was its crust crisp and golden, combed into a little ridge by a stroke of the baker's knife before the loaf entered the oven, but it was made with real old yeast which gave the crumb a most appetizing and tonic sour savor. Only in two places in the world was such bread to be found: San Francisco and Paris. The most serious damage some of our restaurateurs have been able to do to the gastronomic reputation of San Francisco they have done by substituting the little dry, savorless, uninteresting individual rolls, shaped like dolls' pillows, and just as tasteless. One might as well eat excelsior. The old times are going. It is dull work toting a tray. No man has ever been able to do it with dignity.

Humanity is again on the eve of a great regeneration, a new birth of hope and promise. The millennium has dawned once more, this time in darkest Pennsylvania, state of sinful manufacturers and coal barons, and the mounted constabulary our pink reformers call Cossacks, and copper-riveted boiler-plated political bosses, and tariff protectees, and all the other grievances discontent can describe. The millennium is always dawning or about to dawn somewhere, but somehow its sun never seems to get much higher than about half-past 9, which, if we remember rightly, was first-drink-time in Wolfville. But in Pennsylvania it now appears with a splendor lacking to all other appearances, and an element of promise whose absence heretofore is sufficient to explain why it has always faded away before 10 a. m. Pennsylvania has a woman boss. She has arrived at last, and in the state of Matt Quay and Boies Penrose, of William E. Crow and Philander Knox. She is Mrs. Gifford Pinchot; and Harrisburg, the capital of the state, has raised its arms in terror and despair and ejaculated through its choking, fat throat, "My God!" The Old Guard hated Pinchot badly enough, ever since he wrested the gubernatorial nomination from the stand-pat aspirant. But with the realization of how it was done has come an added alarm. It was a feminine victory. The cunning hand of feministic generalship has become plainer as the Old Guard has counted the dying and the dead. "It was her work that licked us in the primary," said one of them the other day. "She spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to do it, but she did a damned good job." And the Old Guard may be supposed to know. To reverse Napoleonic tradition, it surrenders when it must, but it never really dies. In the present case its knees are dragging in the dust behind the chariot wheels of a new Queen of Palmyra, Boadicea, what you will, but a woman, and its reluctant acknowledgments swell the roar of victory; a victory with which it will not admit Pinchot himself had much to do. No doubt when it grows callouses under its chains it will be quite accustomed to feeding from the fair white hand that welded on the links; provided it can get anything on which to feed.

Mrs. Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania was Miss Cornelia Elizabeth Bryce of New York, niece, on the distaff side, of J. Sergeant Cram, than whom there has been no more adroit political manipulator among the hosts of Tammany. Her family was wealthy, and she was accustomed to cash, in larger units than two-dollar bills. When the Bull Moose herds were calling over mountain and prairie in 1912, she heard the call and joined. Pinchot was one, and it is said Roosevelt introduced them. Before that time Pinchot had never sought elective office, but after that he had the nerve for anything. In 1915 he added to the gayeties of the Old Guard by running for United States senator against Boies Penrose. He might as well have run for Sphinx, or the Pyramid of Cheops. But his wife said that at least he had dared. She sat at his right hand in his Philadelphia office and whatever she needed to know about real politics she found out then. Old stagers say it was she that did all the daring. They do say that Pinchot never ventured much, and that it was Roosevelt who put him into the Ballinger contest, as his wife put him into the senatorial and the recent gubernatorial. As one of them expressed it while waiting on one foot for the millennium the other day, "it will be a case of spoiling a damn good forester to make a damn poor governor." Be that as it may, as dear old Macaulay was so fond of saying, they have a shrewd opinion as to who is the present boss of Pennsylvania. "Hell's bells!" said the Old Guard. "He ain't running for governor; his wife is running him. She won't trust the campaign even to the state committee. She's goin' to boss the whole shebang, and when he's elected it won't be hard to tell who is really governor, and the boss of this poor old shot-up commonwealth. Where do we old war horses git our hay now?" That is the millennial question. Such wicked institutions as Old Guards should forever disappear in shame before the bright white light of the millennial day. Social justice may be expected, whatever that means; and the abolition of poverty, selfishness, and crime. If any lions can be found in Pennsylvania they can lie right down with the lambs and have no fear.

Automobile Courtesy.

Automobiles in all parts of the United States will soon be bearing on their windshields a little green and white sticker with "automobile courtesy" in large letters over the name of the local automobile club, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger, indicating that the driver of this car is observing the courtesy campaign being conducted by the American Automobile Association in connection with the Chicago Automobile Trade Association and the National Automobile Dealers' Association.

"We believe that 50 per cent. of the automobile accidents which happen on the highways of the United States could be avoided through the use of a little automobile courtesy," said Dai H. Lewis, acting executive chairman of the A. A. A. "Courtesy costs nothing and brings greater results than any other element entering into the driving of an automobile."

"Real automobile courtesy demands that we give the other fellow his share of the road; that we dim our lights when meeting another car at night; that we recognize the fact that the man behind us blowing for the road wants to get by and is not challenging us to a race; in short, it means being agreeable in all these little things that go so far toward avoiding friction."

The American Automobile Association in taking up with its 800 affiliated clubs the question of carrying on this campaign is impressing the need for careful observance of traffic regulations as one of the elements of a courtesy campaign. The traffic officer, the association points out, is only a human being placed in a difficult position because of the necessity of enforcing these regulations and a little courtesy toward him will eliminate many of the more trivial arrests that now clutter up our traffic courts.

The whole operation of the courtesy campaign, the A. A. A. points out, depends entirely upon the old principle of the Golden Rule: "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you."

Shawl Goats.

Cashmere shawls, according to the Philadelphia Public Ledger, are not made of wool of sheep, nor do the animals live in Kashmir. In our everyday parlance the word cashmere is incorrectly applied to material made from the finest grade of the wool of merino sheep raised in Spain, but the real product is made from the soft, very fine and short under-wool of the shawl-goat, which lives in the mountainous regions of Tibet. There are several varieties of this so-called wool, but on the finest of it the Maharaja of Kashmir has a monopoly.

The natives collect it after it has fallen off naturally in the springtime, or remove it and separate it from the hair.

I firmly believe that a desire to go behind the scenes of a theatre and be introduced to actresses is the most powerful, and, in many cases, the most disastrous passion of which human nature is capable, says James L. Ford in the New York Tribune. No mirage of shady grove and cooling spring that ever quickened the pace of the weary desert traveler is as alluring as that which the ingenious youth beholds as he journeys toward the goal that always eludes him. In that mirage he sees himself in that fascinating region that lies behind the footlights, a land of indescribable charm to every one who has never entered it. He sees himself conversing on terms of intimacy with the actresses whom he has watched from his seat in the orchestra or gallery, wondering the while if the radiant qualities that distinguish them in the mimic scene dominate their private lives.

Before leaving Deauville King Alfonso of Spain started a new fashion which is reported to have been taken up by French aristocracy, says a Paris cable to the New York Herald. The king at his last appearance in the Casino for dinner wore a double-breasted dinner jacket. The coat is much longer than the ordinary dinner jacket, and has six buttons, two of which are high up on the chest. It appears, however, that the coat can be worn only by slender men and looks badly buttoned when the wearer is seated.

STORYETTES

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The late Mrs. George Gould, who strongly disapproved of divorce, was once talking to a young divorcee at a Lakewood dinner party. The latter was admiring Mrs. Gould's jewels. In the midst of her gurgling she commented on her hostess' wedding ring. "How old-fashioned it looks!" she babbled on. "In the past they made them so much larger than they do now." "Yes," said Mrs. Gould, cutting in on the gush with precise asperity. "In the past they made them to last a lifetime."

A famous bishop was waiting for his train in an out-of-the-way village when he saw a stranger eying him askance. Fearing he might be cutting a slight acquaintance, the bishop nodded to the man. "Excuse me, mister," said the possible acquaintance, "but I think I seen your picture in the paper onct." "Very probably," answered the bishop. "Kin I ask," the stranger inquired respectfully, "what wuz you cured of?"

The director was reduced to the state of a raving maniac. The star was new and ignorant of the codified procedure in the violent love scene being enacted. "All you gotta do, Geraldine," roared the peeved director, "is shove the hero away from you rough when he tries to kiss you. For the love of Moses! Aint you ever tried to keep a fellow from kissing you?" "Never," said Geraldine.

Two famous actors, novices at the game, were playing golf. They were gradually but surely reducing the turf to an approximation of a plowed field. Finally their caddies felt that they could stand it no longer. One turned to the other with, "Did you say them two are actors, Jim?" "Yes, Jo," admitted the second, anguish and apology struggling in his voice. "Well," said the first, "all I can say is they might make good scene-shifters."

The now proverbial wife of the profiteer was having her nouveau riche home decorated. The place was literally overrun with painters and paperers. The foreman approached the lady and reported, "We have completed the morning room, ma'am; what next?" "You can do the study on Friday," he was told. "What shall we do in the interim, madame?" "Oh, paper that, too," the lady nonchalantly replied.

H. G. Wells has a very heavy, well-preserved thatch of hair and a passion for telling stories concerning his less fortunate fellows. One is of the man who had only a fringe covering the zone from ear to ear at the back of the neck. Even this fringe has to be clipped, and when the man once asked a barber, "May I keep my collar on?" he was told, "Yes, and you may keep your hat on, too, if you like."

The high-powered car was speeding toward a railroad crossing when a train rounded the bend a mile away. The two men in the front seat, both racing fiends, began an argument as to whether or not they could beat the train to the crossing. The driver insisted he could easily make it, his companion that the train would beat them by several minutes. The argument and the speed increased and the train rolled swiftly on. Finally a passenger in the rear seat could stand it no longer. Frantically clutching a side of the car he shouted, "I don't give a damn who wins this race, but I hope it aint a tie."

Wickham Steed, editor of the London Times, is accredited with being an enthusiastic admirer of things American. Particularly, he is said to like the proud spirit of all Americans, high or low. "On one of your New York trolleys," says Mr. Steed, "an English tourist poked the conductor with his stick and said, 'I say, my man, is this the Bowery?' 'No, it ain't, dern yer,' was the haughty reply. 'It's the conductor.'"

One of T. R.'s standing favorites concerned some cowboys who, after catching a supposed horse thief, discovered to their dismay that they had caught and executed the wrong man. One among them who had a reputation for tact was selected to break the news to the victim's wife. "Are you the wife of Jake Smith?" the impromptu diplomat began. "Yes," the woman replied. "No, ye aint, neither; you're his widow," proceeded the tactful one. "I have his body out yonder in the wagon. We hung him for hoss lifting. But there's no need to feel bad about it. We found out after that he was not the guy we wuz looking for. The joke is on us."

On the porch of the abandoned postoffice at Markleeville, which still bears the old sign because everybody knows the postoffice is now in the back of the general store, there is a large safe, also abandoned. It was left there by the superintendent of an Alpine County mine when the company failed years ago. A sympathetic traveler asked a cowboy if the residents knew what was in it, and why they did not open it for its possible contents. "Yes, sir," said the cowboy. "We know exactly what that safe contains, and we have held a-many a rally to try to make up our minds what to do about it. She contains $6.40 and a bottle of whisky, and we are afraid to blow her open for fear of bustin' the bottle."

The late Dan Hanna, according to his friends, hated camouflage of any sort. Hanna used to like telling the story of the girl and the young man in the moonlit palm garden of a Florida hotel. "But," said the girl, gently uncoiling the young man's arm from about her waist—"but, Reginald, is your love real?" "Real?" he cried passionately. "It's as real as the coral in your sweet lips and the rose flush of your cheek!" "Oh—ah—" stammered the girl, "isn't it—er—I mean—it's a lovely evening, isn't it?"

The umbrella is one of the oldest inventions. It appears on the temple walls of Egypt, Assyria, and in the ancient sketches of India and China. No one knows where it originated, but probably in hot climes, as a protection from the sun. In fact, "umbrella" means "sunshade," from the Latin "umbro," shade. It is said to have been introduced into Europe from Persia.

The giant bamboo of India blossoms at the age of thirty years and then dies. It produces large numbers of seeds which the natives use for food if they can live until the crop matures.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Country House Hostess Speaks Her Mind.

The summer season's over and the guests have gone away. Of course they all brought presents, and I view with some dismay, Bird sticks, bird baths, bird houses, door knockers and door stops, All sorts of porch doodaddles from the neighboring gift shops. Queer things of painted tin, to hang on my veranda wall; And fearsome jugs of pottery, to decorate my hall; And dinky sofa-pillows, and dolls for telephones, And paperweights, of scenery painted on cobblestones. Framed verses for my guest room, of sentimental drools; And green one-legged baskets filled with useless garden tools; And teetery tea-tables, and smoke-a-diddle stands, And candlesticks, hand-painted by misdirected hands. And strings of semi-precious junk to dangle round my neck; And knitted scarfs and sweaters—til! I am a nervous wreck. I hope I'm not ungrateful, but the clouds would show a rift. If I could speed one parting guest who hadn't left a gift!

The New Brazil.

On all sides there is evidence of an increasing tendency on the part of Brazil's responsible leaders to face reality, to discard the "made-in-Europe" concept of their country, to know and to dominate their own environment, says Roy Nash in the American Review of Reviews. One case in point is the recent explorations of that intrepid em-pire-builder, General Rondon, who carried a telegraph line across wildest Matto Grosso through obstacles unthinkable to one unacquainted with tropic jungle, exploring and mapping great areas of hitherto unknown territory, standing as the protector of savages who thus came in contact with their civilized neighbors for the first time. Another is the work of the Institut Butantan, where the venoms of poisonous snakes are studied and serums prepared by rigid scientific methods for distribution throughout a country where snakes happen to be more of a menace to human life than elsewhere. These are but two of many instances which might be cited.

There is a New Brazil, and in these two decades of the Twentieth Century it has moved farther in the direction of a larger and finer life for the average man than in the four hundred years that went before. If certain basic problems of a democracy, like public education, have been neglected—charge it to the republic's youth. She has solved one great problem of a modern democracy which the United States has found well-nigh insoluble: with a population where all colors from white to black freely intermingle, Brazil knows no color problem and is torn by no race hatred. She enjoys peace within a land empire which one day will support two hundred millions as easily as it now supports thirty. She is at peace with the ten sovereignties which touch her vast boundaries, and all boundary disputes have been settled in the days of her youth by the peaceful processes of diplomacy.

How We Overcame
the cause of motor oils
breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The British Campaign for the "Left Turn."

A campaign in mass education—designed to end the anomaly which reverses the rule of the road as far as vehicular traffic is concerned, but conforms to common practice on the sidewalks—has been attempted in London since July 1st with little success, says the Boston Evening Transcript.

The left is right for wagons, automobiles, and anything else on wheels all over the United Kingdom. The custom is said to be one of the after effects of the secession of the Church of England from the Church of Rome. The tradition is that the first set rule of the road—keep to the right—was the idea of one of the earlier Popes, who devised the regulations in order to control traffic in Rome. The English, therefore, in renouncing Catholicism did a good job and reversed even the papal method of travel.

Historians say that the change-over was not effective as far as pedestrians were concerned, due to the fact that in those days most men still carried swords. They continued to pass each other on the left because—and here authorities disagree—it was either easier to draw swords and get into action or it was harder for a man to attack you unaware. At any rate, when the English have followed any system at all they have walked to the right.

Carrying of arms having fallen into disuse and "Safety First" become a national slogan, it was decided that it would be much wiser for pedestrians to walk facing the traffic than otherwise and consequently walk to the left was discussed and then an effort made to put it into practice.

Cold statistics say that thirty thousand signs on the pavements and placards on public vehicles and public places were used to drill the idea home, but even so, it is still a long way from there. The authorities of the City of London proper, the original square mile, asserting their inalienable rights of British liberty, refused to have anything to do with the innovation on the ground that walk to the right was on the same plane with common law.

Death of Daniel S. Richardson.

Daniel Sidney Richardson, foreign secretary to the consulate-general of Japan, former assistant postmaster of San Francisco, and for many years secretary and treasurer of the Astronomical Society of the Pacific, died at his residence, 1707 Tacoma Street, Berkeley, on Monday, September 11th.

Mr. Richardson was identified with the early literary circle of California, and enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller, Charles Warren Stoddard, Ambrose Bierce, and later with Philip Verrill Mighels. He was a frequent contributor to the old Overland Monthly, and was the author of a book of verse entitled "Trail Dust," containing such well-known poems as "Panchita," "Yosemite," and "The Promise of the Sierra." He was born in West Acton, Massachusetts, studied at the old College of California, and during Grant's administration was secretary to the American legation in the City of Mexico under John W. Foster, serving in his chief's absence as chargé d'affaires. Returning to San Francisco, he acted for many years as a trusted business agent for the Japanese government, and for these services was twice decorated by the emperor. In his relations with Japan Mr. Richardson was always a consistent factor for peace. He had not been well since the Disarmament Conference at Washington, which he attended as one of the expert advisors to the Japanese delegation, and where his services were highly appreciated by his clients. He was a man of the truest culture as well as the most steadfast loyalty to his country, his family, and his many friends.

Lectures on Aryan Culture.

A course of seven Tuesday afternoon lectures on "Aryan Culture" will be given by Sukumar Chatterji, editor of Chhatra Sahodar, under the direction of Paul Elder in the Paul Elder Gallery. The course will begin September 19th, at 2:30 o'clock, with a summary of "Aryan Culture" in all its aspects. This will be followed on consecutive Tuesdays with "Dawn of Indian Civilization," "Literary Heritage," "Knowledge, Arts, Sciences," "Medical Science and Psychology," "Breathing Systems of India," "Music and Drama."

A Canticle.

Lovely is daytime when the joyful sun goes singing,
Lovely is night with stars and round or sickled moon,
Lovely are trees, forever lovely, whether in winter
Or musical midsummer or when they bud and tassel
Or crown themselves with stormy splendors in the fall.
But, lovelier than night or day or tree in blossom,
Is there no secret infinite loveliness behind?
Beautiful is water, running on rocks in mountains
Or bosoming sunsets where the valley rivers ponder,
Beautiful is ocean with its myriad colors,
Its southern blues and purples, its arctic gray and silver,
Blown into green frost-fretted or wine-dark in the evening.
But still more beautiful than waters calm or cloven,
Than ocean thunder-maned or floored for delicate springtime,
Is there no beauty visible save to our eyes?
Marvelous is the grass, friendly and very clean,
Though intimate with all the dead, the ceaseless dead,
It has great heart and makes the ancient earth forgetful;
It is not troubled by the wind and from the storm
It learns a radiance; all night it wears the dew
And in the morning it is glad with pure gladness.
More marvelous than dew-strown morning grasses,
Is there
No brave immortal joyousness that wrought the grass?
Who lifeth in the eastern sky the dark, gold moon:
Who painteth green and purple on the blackbird's throat?
What hand of rapture scattereth sunshine through the rain
And fingeth round the barren bough of spring returned Dim fire? Who stenciled with caught breath the moth's wide wing,
And lit the ruby in his eyes? Whose ecstasy
Set silver ripples on the racing thunder-cloud
And fared the walls of storm with terrible dead green?
What dreamed fretted dew upon the flat-leaved corn
And twined in innocence of useless perfect art
The morning-glory with its bubble blue, soon gone?
Was there no hand that braided autumn branches in Their solemn breds and stained them with a sombre rust?
Was there no love conceived the one-starred, rivered evening,
And dipped in crocus fire the gray horns of the moon?
They say there never was a god men loved but died—
Dead is Astarte, Astoreth is dead, and Baal;
Zeus and Jehovah share a single grave and deep;
Spring comes, but Freia comes not nor Persephone:
On temple plinth and porch the random grasses run,
Of all their priests alone the white-stolled stars are faithful.
Dead are the gods, forever dead! And yet—and yet—
Who lifeth in the eastern sky the dark, gold moon? . . .
There is a loveliness outlasts the temporal gods,
A beauty that when all we know as beautiful
Is gone, will fashion in delight the forms it loves,
In that wide room where all our stars are but a drift
Of glimmering petals down an air from far away.
—William Alexander Percy in Scribner's Magazine.

Hops.

God will not quit the world because of war,
Nor beauty forget to grow the morning rose.
Life is not thru the building of the earth;
Life will not stop, for life the greater grows.
Now day is hammered blue out of the night;
The world is wrapped in flowers of its dead.
Think not that war was the end of the world,
For there are finer, brighter things ahead.
The earth is too strong to be killed with strife;
A sphere, fire-born, that faced the centuries
Will keep on still, thru centuries to come—
And nothing can shake down that one great peace.
Men have fought wars before, who thought earth lost,
Who termed the nations withered, blind with lust;
They cried, all hope and beauty had been killed.
